In their report of their first examination of the soldier, the New London board say he "presents the general picture of broken constitution, probably resulting from some severe shock to nervous system; slight right lateral curvature of spinal column;" and express their opinion that his disability, resulting from his wound and other injuries, for a portion of same should be rated at "total," and for others "three-fourths of total." In their report of their second examination the same board say that this further examination reveals nothing beyond what they had stated as to their former examination.

The Pension Office seems to have relied entirely upon the report of the Providence board in rejecting the soldier's claim; but your committee are of the opinion that the careful and particular report of the New London board is entitled to the higher consideration, and that the current of the testimony very clearly shows the origin, continuance, and existence of disability incurred in the service and line of duty, in actual battle, for which the soldier should be allowed a pension.

Your committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Chairman, I now ask unanimous consent to have a bill considered, for the reason already given, that I can not be here on the next Friday session.

Mr. SAWYER. I desire to object on the ground——

Several MEMBERS. Do not object.

Mr. SAWYER. Hear me through, if you please. I desire to object on the ground that a gentleman here [Mr. WILBER], a friend of mine, who is also going away to be absent for two weeks, has asked to have a bill considered and objection has been made on the other side of the House. Now, I object to this request coming from that side.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. One recognition of this kind has been conceded to your side. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee now rise.

Mr. MACDONALD. I would state to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SAWYER] that the objection to the consideration of his friend's bill came from the other side the last time.

Mr. WILBER. I hope that any gentleman who has objected to the request of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE] will withdraw his objection.

Mr. MCMILLIN. As both of these gentlemen [Mr. OUTHWAITE and Mr. WILBER] have indicated that they can not be present at next Friday evening's session, I suggest that they both be recognized to have their bills considered.

Mr. SAWYER. With that understanding I am perfectly willing to withdraw my objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. WILBER] be permitted to have the bills indicated by them considered. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

MARY M. SWEET.

Mr. OUTHWAITE called up for consideration the bill (H. R. 955) granting a pension to Mary M. Sweet.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary M. Sweet, the widow of George W. Sweet, late a private in Company A, Seventy-third Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry.

The report (by Mr. YODER) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 955) granting a pension to Mary M. Sweet, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

Mary M. Sweet is the widow of George W. Sweet, who enlisted in Company A, Seventy-third Regiment Ohio Volunteers, November 12, 1861, and was discharged upon surgeon's certificate of disability May 5, 1864, because of gunshot wound of head of left tibia, received in the battle of Gettysburgh, Pa., July 2, 1863, which resulted in necrosis and adhesion. For this disability he was pensioned, and in receipt of pension at the rate of $12 per month at date of his death, July 3, 1885. The widow's claim has been rejected on the ground that in the opinion of the medical referee of the Pension Bureau the death cause is not chargeable to his military service.

Dr. T. Irwin testifies that he first became acquainted with the soldier in 1873; then treated him for a combination of neuralgia and rheumatism, affecting his lower limbs, especially the left, and back. Soldier attributed his trouble to the wound of left leg. Treated him again for neuralgic troubles in April, 1875. About June, 1885, affiant examined soldier and found him suffering from a continual and distressing cough, hurried breathing, weak and rapid pulse, great emaciation, presenting altogether a clear case of the latter stages of phthisis pulmonalis. Just prior to his death he also suffered from edema of feet, extending to knee of wounded leg.

Dr. W. G. Dawson testifies that he has treated soldier more or less from his return from the Army until his death, during which time his nervous system was much impaired; gave him special care from February 15, 1885, till near his death, and considers his death the result of his old and chronic troubles, which had gradually undermined his life power.

It is shown that about January, 1885, soldier received an additional injury to his side by reason of a fall received while walking along the road. The wounded limb gave way, throwing him upon a rock, and from that time on he commenced failing rapidly.

The widow's case is greatly strengthened by a careful examination of the papers in the invalid claim. As far back as 1872 he made claim for increase of pension on account of neuralgia caused by the wound, rheumatism, disease of lungs and heart, and in support of his allegations filed what appears to your committee evidence sufficient to have granted him pension in addition to that granted him for the wound had the laws then in force permitted such action.

The medical examinations in the case afford additional proof of the justice of the widow's claim. An examination in May, 1867, reveals the existence of heart disease in no small degree. One in March, 1868, shows the same. The certificate of examination of October 15, 1872, shows rheumatism of spinal chord, left shoulder, and lumbar regions, which the surgeon says may fairly be ascribed to deranged vital action and the establishment of a rheumatic diathesis from primary injury. September 6, 1875, an examining surgeon makes the following certificate:

"Exit on outer aspect of leg, fracturing the tibia and fibula. On the tibia the cicatrix is deep and adherent, permitting the introduction of the finger to the depth of an inch. Muscles of limb atrophied. Biceps muscle contracted. I find an impaired condition of general health by reason of rheumatic diathesis by reason of the wound. He is emaciated and countenance pale."

Subsequent examinations point to a continuous decay of the vital powers, marked emaciation, and, finally, well-developed disease of lungs. The statement made by Dr. Dawson, heretofore referred to, to the effect that the soldier's death was the result of "his old and chronic troubles," would seem justifiable from the whole history in the case, as appears by the several medical examinations in the case. There is no doubt in the minds of this committee as to the direct connection between the soldier's death cause and his military service. The claim of the soldier for the additional disabilities alleged as far back as 1872 appears to have been ignored entirely in the latter adjudication of his increase applications, which in a measure accounts for the rejection of the widow's claim.

Believing the claim meritorious, your committee report favorably on the accompanying bill and ask that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

CHARLES H. SMITH.

Mr. WILBER called up for consideration the bill (H. R. 5249) granting an increase of pension to Charles H. Smith.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the present pension of Charles H. Smith, late corporal Company K, Seventy-sixth New York Volunteers, be increased from $31.25 to $100 per month, and that the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place his name on the pension-roll at the increased rate above mentioned.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Let us have the report in that case read.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER) was read in part.

On motion of Mr. BAKER, of New York, the further reading of the report was dispensed with.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5249) granting an increase of pension to Charles H. Smith, submit the following report:

That this is one of the most remarkable cases to which the attention of the committee has ever been called. The number and the severity of the wounds received, the suffering consequent thereon, are among the marvels in the surgical history of the war. The sad and pitiable condition in which the beneficiary has lived for the past twenty-four years, and in which he must continue during his whole future life, renders him an object of great sympathy. Two of the committee, physicians themselves, have made a personal examination of the soldier, the conditions of his wounds, and their effects, and fully corroborate the medical evidence attached to this report.

The committee have attached hereto and made a part of this report the statement of the soldier, the letter of Dr. D. S. Foster, one of the prominent surgeons of this city, and the medical examination of Drs. Foster and Baker, extracts from the Medical and Surgical History of the War of the Rebellion, and a letter from Captain Currier, an officer in the soldier's regiment. The high personal character of the soldier is fully established.

The soldier can not receive at the Pension Office the relief to which the committee think he is entitled.

He first was allowed a pension of $8 per month, which has been increased to $31.25, the highest sum he can receive under the law as it now is.

The committee are strongly of the opinion that the soldier is entitled to the relief asked, and they therefore recommend that the bill do pass with the amendment striking out the words "one hundred," in the fifth line, and inserting in the place thereof the words "seventy-two."

"WASHINGTON, D. C., March 2, 1888.

"DEAR SIR: Some five weeks ago, after having seen my wounds, and having learned of their general condition, you introduced a bill in the House of Representatives for an increase of pension therefor, and that the committee (who has said bill in charge) may more readily understand and appreciate their nature, I will make a brief statement relative thereto, and of my services during the late war.

"I enlisted in the United States service, in the town of Cherry Valley, Otsego County, New York, October 14, 1861, being then but sixteen years old; leaving a widowed mother, who at that time was, and is to-day, dependent upon me for support.

"From the time of my enlistment to that of receiving my wounds, I was not absent from regimental duty two days, either from sickness or otherwise,

"I participated in the following engagements: Rappahannock Station, August, 1862; White Sulphur Springs, August, 1862; Gainesville, August, 1862; Bull Run, August, 1862; South Mountain, September, 1862; Antietam, September, 1862; Union, November, 1862; Fredericksburgh, December, 1862; Chancellorsville, May, 1863; Kelley's Ford, June, 1863.

"I will here state that in all of the above engagements my regiment lost both in killed and wounded; in some more, in some less.

"On the 1st of July, 1863, my regiment opened the battle of Gettysburgh, and during the forenoon of that day I received the following wounds:

"The first ball passed through my left thigh; the second ball entered the left groin, passed through the body, and came out at the right hip; the third ball entered above the left hip, passed through the body, fracturing the spinal column, and while lying prone on my face a shell bursting over me tore off a large portion of my right buttock, and in this condition I lay upon the battle-field, much of the time unconscious, for four days, without any assistance or nourishment whatever, the rebels taking my canteen of water, my haversack, shoes, and stockings.

"On the night of the 4th of July my comrades found and carried me to what is known as the McPherson barn, and after divesting me of my clothing wrapped me in a blanket and laid me in the cow-shed.

"On the morning of the 5th I discovered that I was submerged and almost drowned in cow ooze. In this condition I remained until the afternoon, when I was taken from this barn shed, carried to a tree near by, where my comrades wiped me off with straw, and applied to the Christian Commission agents for assistance, and from them I received the first nourishment since the early morn of July 1.

"I was then put on a stretcher and carried to the town of Gettysburgh. On the way I met the regimental surgeon, Dr. Metcalf, who examined my wounds, and told me that if I desired to send any communication to my mother that I had better do so at once. He then gave directions where I should be taken.

"I was placed in an old freight warehouse where there were two amputating tables, and where only those were brought whom the surgeons considered incurable. Here I remained until the 17th of July.

"I was totally helpless, unable to move hand or foot, and was nursed by a comrade. Here it was, after my wounds had been bathed and I had taken nourishment, that I realized the full extent of my wounds. I then discovered my food, in a partially-digested condition, passing out through my wounds on my left side and back, and for nine months all that I ate passed out in this way. I had no regular passage of the bowels during the nine months or more.

"From this building I was taken to an express company building, by Sergt. William H. Myers, where I remained a few days, and was then taken to the private residence of Mr. Robert Sheads, where I remained until December in this helpless condition.

"I had no regular physician, but strange surgeons called continually to examine my wounds. I had no operation performed, took no medicine, as most of the surgeons informed me that it was impossible for me to recover, while some few said that 'while there was life there was hope.'

"From Gettysburgh I was taken on a cot bed to the Citizens' Hospital, corner Broad and Prime streets, Philadelphia, and from there to the Cuyler Hospital, Germantown, where I remained until my term of enlistment expired, and was discharged on the 24th of October, 1864.

"At the time of my discharge I was able to move about with the assistance of two canes, and from that time until the present, a period of twenty-four years, I have had to dress my wounds two, three, and four times each day. The dressing consists in bathing with a sponge and water, applying linen cloths, with a bandage 8 yards in length and 4 inches in width wrapped around my body.

"From the nature of these wounds it is necessary that an orifice be kept open to allow the gases to escape from the stomach, the gathering of which causes the most intense agony, so that it is necessary to have the services of a surgeon very frequently.

"Suppuration continually goes on, and a constant discharge therefrom.

"There have been times when I have been confined to my bed for months, and have had the almost constant attendance of a physician during all these years.

"I have thus briefly stated my condition, and if you think it advisable, and the Committee on Pensions desire, I will gladly appear before them and show my wounds, that they may judge for themselves as to the truth of the matter and the simple justice of my claim.

"From the above you may think that I am complaining of my country for not dealing more liberally with me, but of this fallacy I desire to disabuse your mind. I did not enlist in the service of my country for the compensation which she then paid her soldiers, nor for the pension which she might award her disabled. I enlisted for the grand cause for which she was contending, irrespective of personal comfort, life, or limb. I responded to every call, performed every duty that devolved upon me until I was left helpless upon the field of carnage; and I make no complaints of my country, for I believe that if our Representatives know of and fully understand my case they will at once recognize my claim to an increase of pension and pass the bill without dissension.

"My case was reported by and appears in United States Surgeon-General Barnes's 'Medical Works of the War' (vol. 2, page 88, I think), and after President Garfield was shot, one of the attending physicians having been informed of the similarity of my case, I was examined by him. He stated that one of my wounds was of a more serious character than the President's, from the fact that in my case the intestines were cut, while in the other they were not punctured.

"The above statement is a true and accurate one, and the truth of which I am willing to certify to under oath, and applies to House bill 5249.

"Respectfully, yours,

"C. H. SMITH,

"Hon. DAVID WILBER,

"WASHINGTON, D. C., March 7, 1888.

"SIR: My attention having been called to the bill introduced by you for the relief of Corporal Charles H. Smith, Company K, Seventy-sixth New York Volunteers, the following statement of his case is respectfully submitted:

"I have known Mr. Charles H. Smith for about fifteen years. Being called to attend him at that time, I found him suffering from wounds (four in number) received in the line of duty at the battle of Gettysburgh, Pa., July 1, 1863. (See description of wounds on accompanying paper.)

"At that time the wound described as No. 3, which had healed at the point of entrance and occasioned the most suffering, was opened, allowing a free discharge of pus, wind, and fecal matter. It soon healed, and this delicate, dangerous, and painful operation of opening the intestines has had to be performed as often as once a month, on an average, during the past fifteen years. At such times the patient is usually confined to his bed in a condition of extreme prostration, requiring attendance.

"At all times the discharges being exceedingly offensive to himself and attendants, it is necessary to dress the wounds three or four times daily with sponge and water, and to apply very thick padding to absorb the discharges; the padding being secured by bandages some 4 inches wide and 6 to 8 yards in length.

"Dr. Otis, United States Army, in Medical and Surgical History, says: In 59 cases of stercoral fistula, 9 remained open, 50 closed; 17 in a month, 28 in less than a year, and 5 in from one to four years."

"In addition to the injury to the bladder and spinal column, this case presents two openings from the intestines. One remains open, the other has to be opened, as stated, and is the only case known to me where fistula, having healed, has to be opened periodically to save the patient's life. Besides the disability and suffering which it occasions, the expense attending such a condition is necessarily great, requires attendance, and leaves the patient with the conviction that he is in immediate danger at all times.

"In my opinion the case is exceptional, and deserving the most generous recognition by Congress and the Executive.

"Medical examination in the case of Charles H. Smith, corporal Company K, Seventy-sixth Regiment New York Volunteers, wounded at Gettysburgh, Pa., July 1, 1863.

"The injuries appear to have been made by four distinct missiles; the first three were conical balls, the fourth a fragment of shell.

"First missile.—Wound of entrance situated on left side 1½ to 2 inches below the great trochanter. Wound of exit upon the nates of same side near the median line and just above the infragluteal fold. The ball passed deeply through the glutei muscles for a space of 7 inches.

"Second missile.—Wound of entrance in the left inguinal furrow about 2 inches from the anterior superior spine of the ilium. Wound of exit on the outer side of the right leg about 3 inches downwards and backwards from the great trochanter. The ball must have traversed the floor of the pelvic cavity and the base of the bladder, emerging through the great sciatic notch.

"Third missile.—Wound of entrance on the left side just above the crest of the ilium in the axillary line. Wound of exit near the spinous process of the third lumbar vertebræ. The ball must have passed through the muscles of the abdominal wall and of the back, penetrating the descending colon behind the peritoneum and shattering the third and fourth lumbar vertebræ. The bodies of the vertebræ were probably uninjured. The wound of entrance did not heal for eleven years. It then closed, but opens from time to time or requires to be opened by a surgeon in order to relieve accumulations of fecal matter and pus. In connection with the track of the ball in this wound a fistulous opening, 3 inches in length, has formed over the colon, and connected with this there are several sinuses which burrow among the muscles of the back. This fistula discharges fecal matter and pus and requires constant attention, as it is very prone to inflammation and causes much suffering.

"Fourth missile.—About 2½ inches from the spine to the right, and above the intergluteal furrow, a considerable portion of the erector spinæ and glutei muscles have been torn up, leaving several large scars. The cicatricial tissue is adherent to the sacrum and the fascia in the vicinity.

"Corporal C. H. Smith, Company K, Seventy-sixth Regiment New York Volunteers, aged twenty years, was wounded at Gettysburgh, July 1, 1863, by a conoical ball. He was admitted to the Seminary Hospital from the field, where he had been treated in a private house, and was afterwards transferred to the Citizens' Volunteer Hospital at Philadelphia, where he was admitted on October 3. He was transferred to Germantown March 14, and admitted to Cuyler Hospital on the same day, with 'gunshot wound of abdomen, perforating cavity and injuring intestines,' * * * and discharged the service October 24, 1864. Pension Examiner Horace Lathrop, of Otsego, New York, reported, August 30, 1866:

"'Ball entered left side just above the crest of the ilium, 2 inches above the anterior superior spinous process, passed downward and backward through the wing of the ilium, and out near the last lumbar vertebra. There is now an opening in both localities, and the anterior one discharges fæcal matter. The colon is probably wounded. He requires constant assistance from another person; his other wounds are healed. Disability total.'

"In the Washington Post of July 10, 1881 (soon after President Garfield was shot), appeared the following:

"'Dr. Pope, of this city, cites the following case of recovery from desperate gunshot wounds, which probably has no parallel in the annals of war:

"'Mr. C. H. Smith, a non-commissioned officer in the Seventy-sixth Regiment New York Volunteers, at the battle of Gettysburgh, July 1, 1863, received the following wounds:

"'The first bullet passed clean through the left thigh, close to the body; the second entered the left groin, through what is called Poupart's ligament, grazing the iliac blood vessels and nerves; traversed the pelvis, passing directly through the bladder and hip bones, came out a little behind the right hip-joint; the third entered the body just above the crest of the left ilium, commonly called the edge of the hip-bone, traversed obliquely the abdominal cavity, passing through the descending colon or large intestine, came out close by the spine, partially shattering the bodies of the lumbar vertebræ.

"'All these wounds, by minie-bullets, were received within fifteen minutes, and finally, as the crash of battle on that part of the field rolled away, as he lay prone upon his face, a shell burst directly over him. The explosion jerked his body upward from the ground and the ragged iron tore away masses of flesh from the nates or buttocks down to the sacrum. For four days and nights he lay upon the field without food, drink, or shelter, exposed to the glaring sun and chilling dews, dozens of dead bodies lying around him, while night prowlers, ghouls of the battle-field, robbed the wounded and the slain.

"'On the fifth day the relief party picked him up, rolled him in a blanket, and laid him in a cow-shed, the only shelter, where for two days he was almost immersed in cow-ooze; then he was taken to an old house, where for seventeen days he lay on his back on a hard board plank.

"'The regimental surgeon looked for his death at any moment, but he lived on, improved, took not a single particle of medicine; nor were his wounds probed, the urine dribbling through the wound in the spine. Finally, after several months, he recovered to a certain extent, and now this battle-scarred veteran, modest and courteous gentleman, resides in this city.'"

"SHERBURNE, N. Y., March 9, 1888.

"SIR: The bill you introduced in the House of Representatives on January 16, 1888, to increase the pension of Corporal Charles H. Smith, of Company K, Seventy-sixth Regiment New York Volunteers, merits your earnest attention and the respect and favorable consideration of Congress.

"I will state for your information that I have known Corporal Smith since 1861, when he enlisted at Cherry Valley, Otsego County, New York. He was a good and faithful soldier, performing his duty satisfactorily in every particular up to the battle of Bull Run, August, 1862, when I was wounded, he remaining with the regiment until the battle of Gettysburgh, where he was desperately wounded by three minie-balls and a piece of shell.

"He lay four days upon the battle-field, subject to the exposure of the intense heat of the July sun and the chilling dews of night, without any care, food, or shelter whatever.

"From time to time during the past eighteen years I have seen his wounds, and can testify from personal knowledge of their severity and the great amount of suffering which they entail upon him, and the constant care and attention which he requires in consequence thereof, both from a surgeon and an attendant.

"In conclusion, I think I but voice the sentiment of the loyal people of the country when I say I hope this act of justice will be done to one who gave up all, and freely offered his life to his country in her time of need, and has, and must ever continue, to suffer so much from wounds received in her service.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CARUTH. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of a bill which I will send to the desk.

Mr. SAWYER. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the title of the next bill on the Calendar.

Mr. WARNER. I can present, I think, a special reason why this bill which I hold in my hand should be called up now. I have been here at every one of these evening sessions, and I expect to be here at every one during this Congress. Therefore I would like to call up a bill by unanimous consent.

Mr. SAWYER. I object. I do not know what the special ground is.

Mr. WARNER. I say that I have been here at every evening session during this Congress, and expect to be present at every evening session hereafter. Therefore I ask unanimous consent.

Mr. SAWYER. I object.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I am obliged to go away from the city to-night to be absent several days. I desire very much to have considered the case of a lady seventy-five years of age who is near her grave. I am exceedingly anxious to take to her the news that her bill has passed. The bill is short, and also the report.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BAKER] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill for the reasons which he has stated. Is there objection?

Mr. SAWYER. I ask the gentleman whether he will be here next Friday evening.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I hope to be; but I wish this bill passed now, so that I may take the news of its passage to this old lady.

Mr. BLAND. I think we had better go on with the Calendar.

MRS. ARABELLA CODDINGTON.

The next business on the Calendar was the bill (S. 293) granting a pension to Mrs. Arabella Coddington.

Mr. GEAR. I ask that this bill be considered.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, at the rate of $25 per month, the name of Mrs. Arabella Coddington, widow of E. H. Coddington, late captain of Company H, Forty-fifth Regiment of Iowa Infantry Volunteers, in lieu of the pension she now receives.

The report (by Mr. SPOONER) was read, as follows:

Mrs. Arabella Coddington is the widow of Eli H. Coddington, who was a sergeant of Company F, Fourteenth Regiment Iowa Volunteers, and also a captain of Company H, Forty-fifth Regiment Iowa Volunteers, which latter rank he held at the time of his final discharge.

The soldier lost his left arm from a gunshot wound received in action at Fort Donelson, Tennessee, February 13, 1862, he then being a sergeant, and was discharged for disability August 15, 1862. He was subsequently mustered into service as captain of Company H, Forty-fifth Iowa Volunteers, and served until September 16, 1864, when he was mustered out with his company.

He was pensioned for loss of his arm and its results, first at $8 per month, and subsequently, by reason of increasing disability, etc., at $15, then at $18, and finally at $24 per month, which last-named rate of pension he was receiving at the time of his death.

He died July 30, 1877, of consumption. After his death his widow was pensioned at the rate of $8 per month, on the ground that the loss of arm of the soldier (which was assumed as the origin of the cause of soldier's death) occurred when the soldier was a sergeant.

The medical evidence on file, which is very full and particular, shows that the soldier suffered, after said wound, and while in hospital from chronic diarrhea, which reduced him to a mere skeleton and very nearly caused his death; and that after his final discharge his general health was badly shattered and his system greatly debilitated as the result of said wound and his army service, incapacitating him for physical and largely for mental labor, and finally resulting in consumption, of which he died.

Although the loss of his arm appears to have been the chief primary cause of said increasing disabilities and their result, your committee are inclined to concede something as a co-operating cause as the result of service of the soldier while a captain, not only in recognition of the patriotism which induced a man so grievously mutilated to again enter the military service, but also for the, perhaps, more practical reason that they are led to believe, in view of the medical history of his case, that said latter service must have aggravated, and probably created, some of the disabilities which eventually terminated in the soldier's death.

An additional reason exists which renders the widow's claim for increase peculiarly meritorious. Prior to her marriage with the soldier she was a hospital nurse, served faithfully as such, was exposed to and contracted a contagious disease (measles), with which she was seriously and dangerously sick, from which and its results her health was so seriously and permanently impaired that she is a suffering invalid at the present time, and largely disabled from doing any labor for her own support.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I renew my request for the consideration of this bill for the benefit of the old lady whose case I have already mentioned.

Mr. BLAND. Let us have the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next bill.

HENRY STAFFORD.

The next business on the Calendar was the bill (S. 679) granting a pension to Henry Stafford.

Mr. SPOONER. I ask that this bill be considered.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Henry Stafford, late a member of Company K, Seventh Regiment of Iowa Veteran Volunteer Infantry.

The report (by Mr. SPOONER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 679) granting a pension to Henry Stafford, respectfully report:

That they adopt the accompanying Senate report as their own, and recommend the passage of the bill.

["Senate Report No. 136, Fiftieth Congress, first session.]

"The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 679) granting a pension to Henry Stafford, have examined the same, and report:

"Henry Stafford, of Company K, Seventh Regiment Iowa Veteran Volunteer Infantry, made claim for a pension, which was rejected by the Pension Bureau March 5, 1886. This action was affirmed by the First Assistant Secretary of the Interior July 28, 1887. The ground of rejection was the absence of any record of the alleged rheumatism and disease of the lungs, no testimony showing treatment therefor while claimant was in the military service, and no medical evidence showing such treatment prior to 1872. The Commissioner of Pensions states in his letter transmitting the papers to the chairman of this committee that 'the disabilities being classed as obscure, the testimony of laymen can not be accepted to show the facts.' This statement also appears in the opinion of the First Assistant Secretary of the Interior.

"The claim is based on allegations that, during the Atlanta campaign, the soldier contracted disease of the lungs and chronic rheumatism.

"This re-enlisted veteran has no hospital record, and, in the light of the testimony, it is to his credit that he has not.

"Dr. Thomas S. Mealey deposes that he was his family physician before the war; that he never gave him any medicine (referring, evidently, to the period before the war); and that before going into his regiment claimant was in good health.

"James Montgomery, a private in the same company, deposes that at the time of enlistment claimant was 'a strong, able-bodied man, free from disease, and had no symptoms of rheumatism or lung disease;' that at Dallas and Big Shanty, Ga., he was exposed, while marching and on guard duty, to rain; that he contracted something like cramps while in camp, and from that time on had rheumatism, sometimes in one part of his body and sometimes in another, and had also sharp pains in his lungs and difficult breathing; that when he took cold he suffered very much; that these spells continued until he was discharged, and since, up to the present time; and that claimant is totally unfit for hard labor. The grounds of this affidavit are stated to be the personal knowledge of the deponent.

"James W. Campbell, a comrade, deposes to the same effect.

"Timothy Spencer, the captain of claimant's company, deposes that claimant was a well man before he enlisted; that during June, 1864, near Big Shanty, Ga., he contracted, from exposure, lung disease and rheumatism, from which he never fully recovered. 'Being very ambitious, he remained with the company until the close of the war, and did duty at times, but was very much broken in health. He was an excellent soldier.' Deponent knows these facts from 'being personally present with the command.' Asked for another statement, Captain Spencer writes to the Commissioner February 19, 1883, that Stafford, 'while marching and fighting day and night, through rain and mud, in the Atlanta campaign in Georgia, took sick with a cough, and complained of a lameness in the shoulders, and for a great part of the time was unfit for duty, and was very much changed in appearance.'

"Michael Craft deposes that he has known claimant since 1865, and that ever since then he has been afflicted with rheumatism so badly as to lay him up for days and weeks at a time, and unfit him for doing any manual labor; has frequently heard claimant complain of pain in his heart and weakness of lungs; and has been a near neighbor of claimant for eighteen years.

"To the same effect is the affidavit of James H. Frosher, who has known claimant ever since he came from the war in 1865, and has frequently worked for him, claimant being a farmer.

"Dr. R. J. Jay has treated claimant at different times since 1875 until 1882, for lung troubles and rheumatism. Claimant's condition has been such ever since deponent has known him (1875) as to render him unable to labor, at least half the time.

"Dr. Mealey deposes, in addition to his former testimony, that he first visited claimant September 19, 1872, and treated him then for chronic rheumatism.

"The claimant was examined by a board of examining surgeons in 1882, who report their opinion that his disability originated in the service and in the line of duty, and that he is not incapacitated for obtaining his subsistence by manual labor. The disability is rheumatism; can discover no lung trouble. He was examined again January 7, 1885, two of the examining surgeons being of the board which examined him in 1882. As to lung disease the report is adverse, but it states that 'his cough is caused by the disease of his throat.' The report also states that there is a difference in the two sides of his body, resulting from the effects of rheumatism on the muscles. His right shoulder is lower than the left. The right scapula is uncommonly prominent.

"The muscles of the right side of his chest and right arm are soft and flabby. Raising the right arm causes pain. We find tender points as follows: To the right of the fourth and sixth dorsal vertebræ, in the right fifth intercostal space, in the right side, in axilla. The report concludes: 'From the existing condition and the history of this claimant, as stated by himself, it is in our judgment probable that the disability was received in the service, as he claims, and that it has not been aggravated or prolonged by vicious habits. He is in our opinion entitled to a one-half total rating for the disability caused by disease of his throat; total (?) for that caused by rheumatism, the sum of which aggregates ¾, third grade.'

"The claimant applied by letter, in 1884 and 1885, to Messrs. Ashton and Morgan, who, your committee infer, were the surgeons of his regiments, for evidence, but they answered that they had no records and no recollection on the subject of his disability. Want of recollection by a surgeon of an individual case, in such a campaign as that of Atlanta, is not surprising. Exact recollections, unassisted by records, would, after the lapse of twenty years, be suspicious. Besides, as Captain Spencer's testimony shows, this man did not seek medical aid, but, on the contrary, being an 'excellent soldier,' and very 'ambitious, remained with the company until the close of the war.'

"As to the objection that claimant did not call a doctor until 1872, he explains this by saying that he took domestic remedies and patent medicines. This is what the majority of men living on a farm in the country do. The mere fact that he did not call a physician until 1872 weighs nothing against the mass of uncontradicted testimony by which this faithful soldier has sustained his claim. The diseases which afflict him may be 'obscure,' according to medical classification, but the evidence in this case is plain to common sense, even if it is that of 'laymen,' and it would establish claimant's case in any court in Christendom.

"The passage of the bill is recommended."

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I understand the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] withdraws his objection to the consideration of my bill.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Before that is done, I hope my friend from Kansas will allow this bill to be considered.

Mr. MORRILL. Let us pass in the House the bills already acted on in the Committee of the Whole; and afterward, if there should be time, the gentleman can obtain unanimous consent for the consideration of his bill.

FRANCES ANNE PYNE RICKETTS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A bill (S. 393) for the relief of Frances Anne Pyne Ricketts has been reported with the understanding that the bill shall go over until Monday next after the reading of the Journal. It is also understood that the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] and the amendments of the committee shall be considered as pending, and that the previous question shall apply to those amendments as well as to the passage of the bill. The understanding also goes to the extent of allowing fifteen minutes of debate on each side.

Mr. RANDALL. That is the understanding.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will go over under that agreement.

Mr. MORRILL moved to reconsider the several votes; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SIDNEY W. WHITELOCK.

Mr. MACDONALD. I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Private Calendar from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 7490) for the relief of Sidney W. Whitelock, and put it upon its passage.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read, subject to objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Sidney W. Whitelock, late a private in Company K, Eleventh Regiment Missouri State Militia Cavalry, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the report in this case. This is one of the strongest cases I have examined, and I have looked into every paper in connection with it. I know it is a good case.

There being no objection, the reading of the report was dispensed with, and it was ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) is as follows:

This soldier enlisted February 21, 1862, and was discharged April 20, 1865. October 20, 1879, he filed an application for pension, alleging sciatica and spinal disease contracted from exposure. The case was rejected on the ground that there was no record, and that the evidence filed failed to establish origin in the service.

Abundant evidence is offered to show the soundness of the soldier at enlistment, but your committee feel that this is unnecessary, as the long service of the soldier ought to be sufficient to establish that fact.

Benjamin F. Snyder, first lieutenant of claimant's company, testifies that from exposure claimant contracted disease of the liver, and in consequence of the same he was sent to the hospital and received treatment for a long time before he was able to join his regiment; that he testifies from personal knowledge, being present when claimant contracted the disability.

Samuel Boyer and W. T. Whitlock, privates in the same regiment, testify that claimant contracted disease of the liver, which terminated in spinal complaint and sciatica, while in the service, as the result of exposure.

Dr. J. Benjamin testifies that he was claimant's family physician from 1865 to 1872, and from time to time during that period he treated him for chronic rheumatism, and that during the time he was not able to perform any labor nearly one-half the time.

Dr. A. Barber testifies, February 14, 1882, that he has been practicing medicine about twenty years; has known claimant since June, 1865, and since then up to the present time; that he treated claimant for disease of the spine and chronic rheumatism; that the disability should be rated at one-half.

Dr. T. Wakefield testifies, February 14, 1882, that he has been practicing medicine for eleven years; has known claimant for about ten years; that claimant took medicine from him for a few months in 1875; that he treated him at that time for a diseased condition of the spinal nerves, complicated by chronic rheumatism; that he should be rated at one-half.

W. D. Tucker testifies that claimant has been more or less unfit for manual labor since discharge, by reason of rheumatism and other diseases.

Charles K. Goodnow testifies that he has been intimately acquainted with claimant since 1866 and has seen him on an average once or twice every week during each year. Since they have known him they have seen him only able to go around on crutches, and from seeing him and speaking with him they are satisfied that he is diseased and has been ever since they first knew him.

Fred. W. Sumner testifies to an acquaintance since 1867, and has seen claimant on an average once a week during that time. He has been incapacitated from the performance of manual labor at least one-fourth the time.

The examining surgeon at Litchfield, Minn., October 15, 1881, rates him at one-half, incapacitated from obtaining a subsistence by manual labor, and adds that the disability is probably permanent.

All of the witnesses are vouched for as being men of high character.

It seems to your committee that this is an unusually strong case, as the incurrence of the disability in the service, its existence at time of discharge, and continuance since have been established. They therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MACDONALD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NANCY VAN DYNE.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Private Calendar from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 7094) granting a pension to Nancy Van Dyne, and put it upon its passage.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read subject to objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Nancy Van Dyne, mother of James B. Van Dyne, who was a private in Company B, Thirty-third New York Volunteers, and late orderly sergeant in Company I, First Regiment New York Veteran Cavalry, and pay her at the rate of $12 per month.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER) was read, as follows:

Nancy Van Dyne, of Palmyra, N. Y., aged sixty-seven years, is the mother of James B. Van Dyne, late a private in the First Veteran Cavalry Volunteers of New York, in which he enlisted in August, 1863, after having served from October, 1861, in the Thirty-third Regiment New York Volunteers. This mother gave to the Union Army two other sons, namely, Charles H. Van Dyne, who was a member of the One hundred and sixtieth New York Volunteers in 1862, and Peter H. Van Dyne, who entered the United States Navy in 1864. The former son died in January, 1873, and the latter is a resident of Chicago, Ill., an invalid, unable to labor, has no means, and is unable to help his mother.

Nancy Van Dyne is the daughter of Seneca Page, who enlisted in the Ninth or Eighth Regiment of New York Heavy Artillery, at Auburn, N. Y., in November, 1863, and who was probably killed in battle, and so far as we can know fills an unknown grave, for he was never heard from after the month of December, 1863.

The son James, subsequent to his enlistment in the First Veteran Cavalry, and prior to proceeding to the front with his regiment, married, but there were no children born of said marriage. He was in the battle of Cedar Creek, taken prisoner and confined in Confederate prisons at Lynchburgh, Danville, and Salisbury. In the winter of 1865 he was paroled at Wilmington, N. C.; from there sent to Annapolis, Md., which place he reached March 7, 1865, weak and emaciated owing to lack of food, and at that place the mother met him and remained with him until March 26, 1865, when he died.

Shortly after the death of James his widow married one Charles E. Wilbur. This was in July, 1865 or 1866. With her Wilbur lived about three years, and then procured a divorce on the ground of the woman's unfaithfulness. At the time of the divorce the parties resided in Palmyra, and shortly thereafter the unfaithful wife left for parts unknown, and her whereabouts have ever since been and are now unknown.

The mother, Nancy Van Dyne, is in destitute circumstances, dependent upon charity for her support.

It appears that the widow of James B. Van Dyne received a pension as such up to July 3, 1866, which seems from the report from the Pension Bureau to be the date on which she married.

The mother made application for a pension as the mother of James, but the same was rejected for the reasons stated.

The claim of this mother is, in the opinion of your committee, entirely meritorious.

Your committee report the bill favorably, and recommend its passage with an amendment striking out after the word "Cavalry," in line 8, and inserting in place thereof the words "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

There being no objection, the bill was considered and the amendment agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BAKER, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

And then (the hour of 10 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m. having arrived) the Speaker pro tempore declared the House adjourned.

Mr. GIFFORD. I did not suppose any gentleman on that side would object. [Laughter.]

CHARLOTTE HARBOR, FLORIDA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 1431) making an appropriation for the establishment of a light or lights and other aids to navigation to guide into Charlotte Harbor, Florida.

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Florida. Mr. Speaker, a bill similar to this has been considered by the House Committee on Commerce, and I ask unanimous consent that the bill be taken up and considered now.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to the right of objection.

The Senate bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $35,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the establishment of a light or lights and other aids to navigation to guide into Charlotte Harbor, Florida, the said amount to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Florida. I now move to amend by striking out all of the Senate bill after the enacting clause and inserting the House bill as recommended by the Committee on Commerce.

The amendment was read, as follows:

That a light, or lights, and other aids to navigation to guide into Charlotte Harbor, Florida, be established at a cost not to exceed $35,000.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let the original bill be read.

The SPEAKER. The original bill provided an appropriation of money.

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Florida. And this amendment provides only for the establishment of the lights or guides to navigation.

Mr. SPRINGER. All right.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading, and being read the third time was passed.

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Florida, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The bill (H. R. 7033) was ordered to be laid on the table.

EMORY R. SEWARD.

The SPEAKER announced as the managers on the part of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 7319) for the relief of Emory R. Seward, Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, Mr. SIMMONS, of North Carolina, and Mr. KERR, of Iowa.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. PENINGTON, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. CUTCHEON, for five days, on account of an important business engagement.

To Mr. BUTLER, on account of important business, from Saturday, the 21st, to Wednesday, the 25th instant.

To Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan, and Mr. HARE, for Saturday next, April 28, on account of important business engagements calling them to Philadelphia.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to Mr. RANDALL to withdraw from the files of the House the petition of Hugh Harkins for a pension, without leaving a copy on file.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT OXFORD, MISS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury submitting an estimate for an additional appropriation to complete work on the approaches to the public building at Oxford, Miss.; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. LANHAM. I ask a change of reference of the bill (S. 71) for the relief of Admiral Carter. It was referred to the Committee on Claims. It ought to go to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The SPEAKER. If it was an erroneous reference that change will be made.

Mr. LANHAM. A House bill of the same character is pending before the Committee on Naval Affairs.

There being no objection, the Committee on Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and it was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to present a resolution for reference.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the resolution which the gentleman from Illinois desires to offer relates to a change of the rules. The Chair thinks that under the rulings heretofore resolutions to change or amend the rules are in order. If that is the character of this resolution it is in order, but it must go to the Committee on Rules or lie over for one day.

Mr. RANDALL. But there ought to be a discrimination between resolutions having that privilege and those which have not.

The SPEAKER. If it is not a resolution to amend the rules, if it is a mere resolution to fix a day for the assignment of business, it is not in order.

Mr. SPRINGER. I withdraw the resolution.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I move that the morning hour for the call of committees be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. If the regular order is enforced there will be no morning hour. If the House proceeds to the special order it comes up immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to call up the measure the consideration of which by a special order was set for to-day.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that if the House declines to proceed with the special order, then the motion of the gentleman from Louisiana will be in order.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I raise the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER. The special order is the consideration of the bill the title of which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7901) to secure to actual settlers the public lands adapted to agriculture, to protect forests and the public domain, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana raises the question of consideration.

Mr. BLANCHARD. My object being to call up the river and harbor bill, I propose to the gentleman from Indiana to allow us to-day and accept in lieu of it some day in the week after next, immediately after the morning hour. If that arrangement can be made I understand the gentleman from Indiana to be willing to forego his privilege for to-day.

Mr. HOLMAN. The statement of the gentleman from Louisiana is correct; with this limitation, however, that this bill being set specially for to-day, and having been pending for a good while, some six or seven weeks, the Committee on Public Lands would be glad to proceed with it. But I do not wish to consume the time as to which bill shall have priority. I ask unanimous consent—and if that is granted I think the Committee on Public Lands will be content to accept the gentleman's proposition—that the Committee on Public Lands have next Tuesday week after the reading of the Journal for the special order of to-day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the special order for to-day be postponed until a week from Tuesday next, immediately after the reading of the Journal——

Mr. HOLMAN. Including a night session.

The SPEAKER. And a recess to be taken at 5 o'clock for an evening session.

Mr. DOCKERY. Beginning at 8 o'clock.

Mr. PAYSON. I understand the request to be that that day shall be set apart for the business of the Committee on Public Lands, and not merely for the special order.

The SPEAKER. The proposition is that the special order for to-day shall be continued until the day named, Tuesday week next.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask permission to add that I have suggested the day named for the reason that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON], who is largely identified with the measure the title of which has been read, is not able to be here during the coming week.

Mr. HEARD. I ask the gentleman from Indiana if his motion contemplates the consideration at that time of any other bills than this one. As I understand the proposition it refers to this only.

Mr. HOLMAN. There are other bills which we wish to take up.

Mr. HERMANN. We desire also the consideration of some local measures already reported from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly. If the House gives the committee next Tuesday week after the reading of the Journal, including an evening session, the committee will determine what bills shall be taken up.

Mr. HERMANN. With that understanding the proposition is satisfactory to me.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will restate the request. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that next Tuesday week, immediately after the reading of the Journal, be set apart for the further consideration of the bill the title of which has been read, and such other bills reported by the Committee on Public Lands as may be reached, and that there be a recess from 5 o'clock until 8 o'clock, the evening session also to be devoted to the consideration of such bills. Is there objection?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I object.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I call up the special order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana calls up the special order and the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD] raises the question of consideration.

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SPRINGER. Would it be in order to move to postpone this bill?

The SPEAKER. Not if the House refuses to consider it, because the motion to postpone is in the nature of consideration.

Mr. SPRINGER. If the House should postpone its further consideration until the 1st of May next, would not the bill occupy the same position at that time which it does now?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has answered the gentleman's parliamentary inquiry. If the House determines not to proceed to the consideration of the bill, no motion to postpone can be made because the bill is not before the House; but if the House should determine to consider it, then that motion might be made.

Mr. SPRINGER. And would not the bill have the same status that it has now?

Several MEMBERS. Regular order.

The SPEAKER. This bill would, but the special order as to the other bills would be lost. The regular order is demanded. The question is, Will the House now proceed to the consideration of the bill the title of which has just been read?

A MEMBER. What is the bill?

The Clerk again read the title:

A bill (H. R. 7901) to secure to actual settlers the public lands adapted to agriculture, to protect the forests on the public domain, and for other purposes.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 73, noes 76.

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, 41 members voting in favor thereof.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 85, nays 126, not voting 113; as follows:

So the House refused to consider the homestead bill.

On motion of Mr. BLANCHARD, by unanimous consent, the reading of the names of members voting was dispensed with.

The following-named members were announced as paired on all political questions until further notice:

Mr. HOGG with Mr. YARDLEY.

Mr. HAYES with Mr. FELTON.

Mr. TAULBEE with Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas.

Mr. PENINGTON with Mr. DAVENPORT.

Mr. PIDCOCK with Mr. HARMER.

Mr. CLARDY with Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana.

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi, with Mr. WILLIAMS.

Mr. MATSON with Mr. PUGSLEY.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina, with Mr. FLOOD.

Mr. FORAN with Mr. HOLMES.

Mr. HUTTON with Mr. PATTON.

Mr. MCSHANE with Mr. CROUSE.

Mr. YODER with Mr. FINLEY.

Mr. MAISH with Mr. WHITE, of New York.

Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL with Mr. BELDEN.

Mr. BURNETT with Mr. WHITING, of Massachusetts.

Mr. RUSK with Mr. BROWN, of Ohio.

Mr. SCOTT with Mr. COOPER.

Mr. LANE with Mr. WICKHAM.

Mr. LATHAM with Mr. GROSVENOR.

Mr. PERRY with Mr. DUNHAM.

Mr. BURROWS with Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia, on all political questions, from this day until Tuesday, April 24.

The following-named members were announced as paired for this day:

Mr. MAHONEY with Mr. JOHN R. BROWN.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, with Mr. BOWDEN.

The following were announced as paired on this vote:

Mr. TOWNSHEND with Mr. BAKER, of New York.

Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I understood that I was paired, and therefore refrained from voting; but I have not heard the pair announced, and I now desire to vote.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can make a statement, which will go into the RECORD, but the Chair thinks that under the rule his vote can not be recorded.

Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts. Very well; if the statement goes into the RECORD I am satisfied. If I could be permitted to vote, I should vote "no."

Mr. FORAN. Mr. Speaker, I find that I am still paired with the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HOLMES], although I gave notice Tuesday morning that the pair was withdrawn. Under the circumstances I withdraw my vote.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OWEN] on the river and harbor bill. I do not think that pair properly applies to this vote; and, inasmuch as it does not affect the result, I will allow my vote to stand.

The SPEAKER. The pair was not announced.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I again ask unanimous consent that next Tuesday week, after the reading of the Journal, be set apart for the consideration of this bill and bills forfeiting land grants.

Mr. MILLS. I object.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the morning hour for the call of committees.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Pending the request of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD], I ask unanimous consent that gentlemen having reports to present may hand them to the Clerk.

Mr. BLANCHARD and others. There is no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana that the morning hour for the presentation of reports be dispensed with?

Mr. KEAN. Regular order.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN] intend that as an objection to the request?

Mr. KEAN. I do.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I move, then, to dispense with the morning hour.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Pending that motion I ask unanimous consent that, if it be agreed to, members having reports may send them to the Clerk.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey, that if the morning hour for reports be dispensed with gentlemen having reports may send them to the Clerk? The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered. The question is now upon the motion to dispense with the morning hour, which requires a vote of two-thirds.

The question having been put,

The SPEAKER said: In the opinion of the Chair more than two-thirds have voted in the affirmative. [A pause.] The motion is agreed to.

PURCHASE OF FOREIGN-BUILT SHIPS.

Mr. DUNN, from the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, by unanimous consent, reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 3280) to amend sections 4132 and 2513 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, so as to authorize the purchase of foreign-built ships by citizens of the United States, and to permit the same to be registered as vessels of the United States, and to admit certain materials to be used in the construction of vessels free of duty; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. DUNN. On behalf of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] I ask unanimous consent that the minority of the committee have leave to file their views on this bill, to be printed with the report of the majority.

There was no objection.

Mr. FARQUHAR submitted in writing the views of a minority of the committee on the bill just reported.

AMENDMENT OF REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. COLLINS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 8715) to amend Title LX, chapter 3, of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MILO M'CRILLIS.

Mr. KERR, from the Committee on Claims, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 7718) for the relief of Milo McCrillis; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MONUMENT TO COMMEMORATE THE BATTLE OF TRENTON.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on the Library, reported back with amendment the bill (S. 599) in regard to a monumental column to commemorate the battle of Trenton, in the State of New Jersey, and appropriating $30,000; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, my purpose being to have the river and harbor bill again taken up.

The motion of Mr. BLANCHARD was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. MCMILLIN in the chair.

Mr. MCADOO. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The river and harbor bill, on which, as the Chair assumes, the gentleman proposes to speak, has not yet been reached.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask whether the river and harbor bill is not the unfinished business in Committee of the Whole?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the rules make no provision for taking up unfinished business in Committee of the Whole, as is done in the House. The river and harbor bill must be reached by passing over the intervening bills.

Mr. SPRINGER. With a bill of this character—a general appropriation bill—the practice, it seems to me, has been to proceed at once to the consideration of the bill if left unfinished at a previous sitting of the Committee of the Whole.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would be obliged to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] if he would indicate any rule under which that can be done. The gentleman will probably concede that the rules do not so provide.

Mr. SPRINGER. But the practice, it seems to me, has always been for the Committee of the Whole to return at once to the unfinished business.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the proper way to reach any bill in the Committee of the Whole is to pass over the preceding bills. Does the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD] ask that the first bill in order be passed over?

Mr. BLANCHARD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the title of the first bill in order.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6833) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to passing over this bill?

Mr. McCREARY. On the part of the Committee on Foreign Affairs there is no objection, it being understood that the bill does not lose its place on the Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and the bill is passed over.

The next bill in order, being the bill (H. R. 8989) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes, was also, by unanimous consent, passed over.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed the consideration of the bill next in order, the bill (H. R. 9050) making appropriations to provide for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The pending paragraph was the following:

Improving harbor at Flushing Bay, New York: Continuing improvement, $15,000.

Mr. McADOO. I move pro forma to amend by striking out the last word. Mr. Chairman, when the debate closed last evening the gentleman from the upper portion of New York State [Mr. NUTTING] had made some criticisms upon the remarks of the gentleman (then absent) who represents a part of New York City [Mr. COX] as to the appropriation for the harbor of New York. In the absence of the gentleman from New York City, and representing, as I do, the territory immediately opposite that great city, and bounding upon its bay, I think it only just to the place which I represent, with its all-important interests in the improvement of that harbor and the water ways surrounding it, that I should say a few words in reply to the gentleman from New York.

I did not comprehend at the time why the gentleman from New York [Mr. NUTTING] should have entered into a defense of his own town. The gentleman seemed to be supersensitive of what he called a suggestion or a hint that the harbor in his own district, that of Oswego, had been very liberally dealt with.

But when I come to examine the facts and read the engineer's report, which accompanied this bill, I am not at all surprised at the gentleman from New York, and before the place had been attacked, should have entered upon a very vigorous defense of Oswego.

But I must say, and I say it dispassionately and without anger or feeling other than friendship for the gentleman from New York [Mr. NUTTING], that I think he had no right to make a criticism on the statement of the illustrious gentleman from the city of New York [Mr. COX], and which statement was to the effect that the committee had failed to appreciate the importance of the great water ways which surround that metropolis, in the light of the facts and figures with reference to the harbor of Oswego in his own district.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has stated that during the last twelve or seventeen years the port of Oswego had paid into the United States Treasury the sum, I think, of $12,000,000. That is so; but the gentleman from New York neglects to tell this House that the trade and importance of Oswego as a commercial port have been revolutionized by railroad transportation and has steadily decreased. We have appropriated from the beginning for the improvement of the harbor of Oswego a very large sum of money, over $1,000,000, while the commercial importance of that place has been decaying year by year. In 1870 there was collected of revenue at the port of Oswego $1,112,352.82. In 1886 it had fallen off to $620,599.34, as is shown by this table.

The following table shows the commercial statistics of the port from 1870 to 1886, inclusive:

1870	$1,112,352.82	$1,388,802	$6,868,162	846,743	5,164

The engineer in his report in reference to this harbor and its commercial importance makes the following remarks. When these improvements began this was the situation:

1. For the upper lakes. The Erie Canal as against the water-route by Lake Ontario and the Welland Canal, and the railroad lines westward, as against all water-routes.

2. For Lake Ontario ports. None.

At the present time the freights first referred to are almost or quite diverted from Oswego by the competition among themselves of the other competitors.

For the carrying trade of the Ontario Basin there is now the competition of the railroad systems (embracing Canadian roads) which pass around the lake by bridge at Niagara, and by ferry at Morristown, Brockville, thus opening a winter route for a traffic (formerly) confined to the navigation season on the lake. For two years past this competition has been felt to the detriment of the commerce of Oswego, in each of its three principal lines, coal, lumber, and barley; in the first two shipments have diminished; the last holds nearly up to the average of the last nine years.

The general effect of the commercial rivalry as above has obliterated that of the harbor improvement.

And yet for this Ontario Basin, which includes Oswego and contiguous ports on Lake Ontario, we are asked in addition to the great sums heretofore spent to add by this bill the thousands and thousands of dollars thereby appropriated.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WEAVER. I will take the floor and yield my time to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. McADOO. I thank the gentleman from Iowa for his courtesy.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in turning to the recommendation of the engineer, in his annual report for this year in reference to this harbor, I find it stated that the amount that can be profitably expended in the fiscal year ending on the 30th of June, 1889, is $80,000. Here is a harbor which by the figures is shown to be decreasing in commercial importance, and for which the engineer states only $80,000 can be profitably expended for the next year; yet in the face of that the Committee on Rivers and Harbors asks for Oswego an appropriation of $100,000—$20,000 in excess of the amount, Mr. Chairman, which the engineer says can be profitably expended at that place, and in face of the fact that it is usual to cut down rather than increase. This is one of the inconsistencies of the committee, and yet I appreciate their labors.

I frankly admit I believe they have done, under the existing vicious system, their best, considering the delicate situation which they have occupied to the House and the country in their desire to pass a bill; but it is only right I should call the attention of the House to these items by way of showing how this system works. The Passaic River, which runs from far above the city of Newark into Newark Bay, and thence into the Bay of New York, has a commerce of over 13,000,000 tons, and greatly in advance—about twice as large as that of Oswego Harbor. If I had time I would be glad to read the engineer's report, and run a comparison between the importance of the Passaic River and the great city of Newark, as a commercial port, with that of Oswego.

And there, where the engineer shows that $107,000 at the very least ought to be the sum appropriated to that important harbor, that great city with 170,000 people, and on my own side of the river, the district which I represent, with a population near the river of 20,000 more, a great manufacturing center, they have given in this bill, I think, only $35,000.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Thirty thousand.

Mr. McADOO. A cut of $70,000 on the amount recommended by the engineers for this very important river. So we find now on the one hand while the committee gives to the city of Oswego, a city which has been revolutionized commercially, where the engineer states that the grass is growing on its docks, an excess over the amount recommended by the engineers of $20,000, for this great and important city of Newark and its suburbs, and the all-important Passaic River, emptying its waters into the bay of New York, with manufactories springing up on its banks in all directions, with steadily-increasing trade and population, instead of diminishing as at Oswego, there is a cut of $70,000 below the sum recommended by the engineers. Is this just? Is it not glaringly inconsistent? Does not this show the radical weakness of river and harbor bills?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GOFF was recognized.

Mr. NUTTING. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I am surprised——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia has been recognized.

Mr. NUTTING. I beg pardon; I did not observe that the gentleman had the floor.

Mr. GOFF. Mr. Chairman, surely the position assumed by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO] can not be sustained. We hear too often, it seems to me, objections to this bill based upon the idea, as charged, that the appropriations are made in favor of the several States of the Union. That seemed to be the objection taken by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] on yesterday. It is claimed that this bill is unfair, full of favoritism, and that it merits defeat, because the States represented in part by the members composing the Committee on Rivers and Harbors receive, as it is expressed, the larger part of the appropriations provided for by the bill. This comment is, in my opinion, unjust, though in one sense the statement is true. And why? Because that committee is properly composed of members living in the sections of the country where these great improvements are located, familiar with their condition, and interested in their completion and success. The committees of this House are supposed to be formed on this theory. But that does not make these appropriations local in character.

I trust this House will not consider the matter in this narrow view. In the first place the States get nothing by this bill; State lines are obliterated, and the nation has the entire amount. The fact that a great river flows through or by a State, not represented by me, does not deprive me, or the people I represent, of my, of their interest in that river. The fact that the money appropriated is to be expended in a State does not give the citizens of that State the entire benefit flowing from it. The States have not control of our navigable water ways, the nation has, and it is well for us that it is so. Shall I oppose an appropriation to improve the Missouri, the Cumberland, the Wabash, or the Kennebec, because those rivers do not flow through the State I in part represent here? Certainly not. I am interested in Missouri, in Kansas, in Nebraska, in "the wonderland of Dakota," where the Missouri runs; also in Kentucky and Tennessee where the Cumberland is; in Indiana and Illinois, where we find the Wabash, and in Maine, where the Kennebec rolls down to the sea, just as much as are the gentlemen who represent those States. Their interest is my interest, their gain the gain of my people, and their loss the loss of my constituents.

Shall I oppose an appropriation in which Minnesota, Wisconsin, Michigan, and Ohio are directly interested concerning the commerce of our great Northwest and our system of lake improvements and traffic because forsooth the money is not to be expended in West Virginia, or because the waters of that State do not flow northward to the lakes? Most assuredly not. The flag of my country is on those waters, floats through those lakes, and stands sentinel to their commerce, and that is enough for me.

Again, shall I support an appropriation for the Lower Mississippi, for the valley of the Ohio, just because the rivers running from the mountains of West Virginia by my own door—laden, if not with the white sails of commerce, at least with the love and patriotic devotion of the people with whom I live—take those channels to the Gulf? I trust not; but I will support such an appropriation cheerfully because those valleys receive the waters of a great part of and bear the interior commerce of a continent. Over sixty million people are interested in them.

Mr. LONG was recognized, and yielded his time to Mr. GOFF.

Mr. GOFF. Am I to oppose the improvement of Boston Harbor, of the harbors of New York, Norfolk, Charleston, Galveston, New Orleans, and San Francisco because West Virginia has no seacoast and no harbors to improve, in the sense of the arguments submitted by the opponents of this measure? I hope not. West Virginia is interested in all these harbors. She is not a silent but an active partner. These harbors, these improvements, are the assets of our common Union, and the sisterhood of our States makes us all participants in their benefits and colaborers for their protection.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia has the floor.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I beg pardon. I thought the gentleman had concluded.

Mr. GOFF. Not quite.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I do not care to interrupt the gentleman, but I thought he had finished. It sounded like a peroration.

Mr. GOFF. No, sir; wait until you hear it.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Very well.

Mr. GOFF. A few words more, Mr. Chairman, and I shall be pleased to hear, as I always am, from the gentleman from Maine.

I believe in internal improvements. I am in favor of Congress making liberal appropriations for our rivers, our harbors, our water ways. I believe money so expended is well expended. Because occasionally mistakes are made, and they are, it seems, in this character of legislation as in others, is no reason why the system should be condemned. There is not an appropriation in this bill for a purpose not in continuance of work heretofore commenced or not recommended to this House repeatedly by the engineers in charge and by the War Department. I will not be deterred from casting my vote for this bill by reason of such criticisms as we have been favored with by its opponents. I for one wish this measure had passed under suspension of the rules, so that valuable time could have been utilized, spring time and summer time, in pushing and completing the work provided for.

Mr. Chairman, much good has been accomplished by legislation similar to this. Avenues of trade have been opened up and our commerce has been greatly increased. Sections of our country heretofore inaccessible to and distant from each other have been placed in communication and brought close together. The interior has been sent to the seacoast, and in return the coast has gone up to the mountains. Manufacturing establishments have been built up and the hum of our industries has invaded the wilderness. The water ways of the country are the arteries by which much of the prosperity and happiness of the people is provided for and regulated; therefore I would guard them with the strong arm of the nation's law and sustain them with the golden wealth of its Treasury. [Applause.]

Mr. NUTTING. I do not know that I am surprised at the course or the language of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO]. I am not surprised at it because I know that my friend is not so unfair as he is ignorant about the facts. I think if my friend from New Jersey had understood what he was talking about he would himself have left no necessity for a reply. The gentleman speaks of the city of Oswego and of the harbor of Oswego, and he says that the docks of that city are overgrown with grass. He has no basis upon which to found such an assertion. In order to prove to the House that he has not, I desire to show two sets of figures which the gentleman has in his hand; but I suppose, in reading the report, when he got to the clause which would have explained all about it his eye-sight failed or something of that kind, so that he did not read it.

Last year there was collected in the harbor at the city of Oswego $622,198.27 of customs duties on goods that came in from a foreign country, and I suppose the most of those goods went forward to assist the commerce in the channels which the gentleman has so eulogized near his own home. The commerce which comes from the Great West and Canada goes down to New York and helps the commerce there to be and appear what it is. The gentleman says the business of Oswego has fallen off. The tonnage of this harbor in the year was 446,560 tons; for the year 1886 the tonnage of this harbor was 350,201 tons, and the average tonnage for twelve years, commencing with 1875 and ending with 1876 inclusive, was 400,303.

Let us see a little further. The gentleman stated one thing which upon its face had some appearance of truth, and therefore it is proper I should answer him on that. He says that in the report of the Chief of Engineers his recommendation for the harbor of the city of Oswego is $80,000, and there has been appropriated $100,000. That is half true, and I am glad the gentleman has succeeded in being thus much correct in what he has said. But he forgot to read a little further and find what the Chief of Engineers said later on in obedience to a resolution of this House, and before this appropriation was made. The Chief of Engineers says in that supplemental report that $80,000 should be immediately appropriated for the repair of a breach in the piers of the harbor of Oswego, which occurred as long ago as 1883. In 1883 the storms from the northwest breached the piers in the harbor of the city of Oswego and swept away 150 feet. And I came here myself to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and begged of them to appropriate the money necessary to fix up this breach in the piers and make this harbor safe for the shipping that went in there. This House gave me $80,000 by the bill of 1885, and the bill finally failed. And to-day, and all through the years 1884, 1885, 1886, 1887, and up to this time, the breach in the piers of 150 feet remains.

It remains now so that for 150 feet in a pier which is a mile and some hundreds of feet long the sea sweeps into the harbor and injures and endangers the shipping there and the property upon the docks and the very piers themselves. The Chief of Engineers says that we should have $80,000 now to repair that breach in the pier. Another thing which my friend forgot to state is that by some mistake in years past the engineers placed in the mouth of the harbor a pier which made an opening of 350 feet for ships to go through, but experience has taught that the channel is too narrow, and it has been a costly experience, for within the last ten years seven vessels have been wrecked there, if my memory serves me correctly, and the engineer reports that this pier should be removed and that it would cost $15,000 to remove it. Now, Mr. Chairman, this bill carries $100,000 for Oswego; $80,000 must be used to repair the breach and $15,000 to remove the pier. That leaves only $5,000 for the purposes of ordinary repair.

This appropriation is reasonable, for it is only $100,000 of $160,000 recommended by the Chief of Engineers. I submit as a part of my remarks the resolution of the House and the answer thereto upon which this appropriation is founded.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Chairman, if appropriations for river and harbor improvement were made upon the basis of the local product of eloquence, I should at once propose to amend this bill by doubling the appropriation for West Virginia. [Laughter.]

Mr. GOFF. That is what you ought to do any way.

Mr. BOUTELLE. And if the other portions of the country could only be persuaded as easily as the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] persuades himself that appropriations to be expended upon rivers in the interior of some particular State will answer the same purpose to another locality on the seaboard as the actual improvement of its own harbor, perhaps there would be less dissatisfaction than there is with this bill.

Mr. GOFF. If that interior improvement sends commerce to the harbor to which the gentleman alludes, does it not benefit that harbor?

Mr. BOUTELLE. Unquestionably; and I am in favor of these internal improvements; but my friend will observe that even if the improvement of his interior locality does increase the amount of commerce to one of these ports on the seaboard, if the harbor of that port is left without needed improvement, the commerce will have a pretty hard time getting in and out.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to have it understood at the outset that I am not criticising this bill because of the amount of the appropriations that are to be applied to legitimate improvement of rivers and harbors. I am in favor of improving rivers and harbors. I believe there is no object to which the surplus revenue of this country can be more beneficially applied than improving the navigable waters of the country; but my objection to this bill is that it does not proceed upon a fair treatment of the different localities. The gentleman says that I complain because appropriations are made for the several States of the Union. Why, the several States form the Union. I make no such complaint as that. I make no complaint because large appropriations have been made for States represented by the members of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. My complaint is based on the background of that fact, upon the fact that States which are not represented on that committee are not so liberally treated as they ought to be.

According to the surveys of the Engineer's Bureau, as shown in the report up to last December, to say nothing of some additional surveys that have been sent in since the report was made, there ought to be expended upon the improvement of rivers and harbors in the State of Maine $1,857,000. These are improvements of a practical, substantial character, in recognized harbors and rivers of much importance, where there is a large commerce and where the need is obvious; and for these improvements the Engineer's Bureau recommends an appropriation of nearly $2,000,000. Now, if the money is available it ought to be expended at once. It would be a matter of economy to the Government to expend every dollar of that sum in one or two years. But how much is appropriated in this bill for improvements in the State of Maine? The bill appropriates just $170,500. I am told that that amount is entirely satisfactory to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and that therefore I ought to be satisfied. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] tells us that this is a part of a great scheme to benefit the whole country, and that because some other States have been liberally provided for I ought to be satisfied to have the improvements in my own locality neglected.

Mr. COGSWELL was recognized.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I wish the gentleman would let me go on. There will be plenty of time, and if he will give me five minutes I may say something more that will require his attention.

Mr. COGSWELL. Mr. Chairman, I will not occupy five minutes. In what I have to say I may give the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] an occasion to reply, for my remarks will be devoted to him.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] stated yesterday that the allowance in this bill to the rivers and harbors of New England States was "meager and miserable." If the gentleman says that for effect elsewhere I have nothing further to say, but will leave it to the gentleman himself, with that high regard for accuracy and moderation for which he is distinguished, to reflect upon in his leisure moments prior to making his biennial raid upon the discriminating and intelligent citizens of his district this fall. [Laughter.] But if he makes the statement for the purpose of prejudicing the passage of this bill, I have a word to say. As a member of the River and Harbor Committee, particularly charged with the interests of the improvements of the rivers and harbors in New England, I wish to say, in justice to my associates upon the committee, that those interests have been not only fairly but handsomely treated by that committee.

Mr. Chairman, the rivers and harbors of this country are divided into districts, each under the charge of some member of the United States Corps of Engineers, that member being called the local engineer. The estimates of these local engineers of amounts which could be profitably expended during the coming year for the whole country, with its 25,000 and more miles of coast and lake and river front—not all of it in Maine—aggregated the sum of $160,000,000. Those estimates, carefully reviewed and considered by the Chief Engineer here in Washington, looking to the minimum amount which could be expended without wasting the improvements we had entered upon, could only be cut down to $40,000,000. The committee, looking to practical results, did not think this House would support them in a bill making an appropriation of the amount estimated by the Chief Engineer—$40,000,000. So they adopted a rule looking to a bill appropriating 45 to 47 or 50 per cent. of the Chief Engineer's estimates for the entire country. This was the only guide they had; and they were warranted by practice and by the sanction of law in following it.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Do I understand the gentleman——

Mr. COGSWELL. I have no time for interruption now. To be sure, the gentleman from Maine had not then made his speech, and we could not avail ourselves of that information, nor did he appear before the committee, although invited to do so. Now, what has the committee produced? A bill aggregating about 47 per cent. of the Chief Engineer's estimate for the entire country; and the gentleman says that New England's share in this bill——

Mr. BLANCHARD obtained the floor and yielded his time to Mr. COGSWELL.

Mr. COGSWELL. And the gentleman says that New England's share of that bill is a "meager and miserable pittance." Why, Mr. Chairman, the whole country getting but 47 per cent. of the Chief Engineer's estimate; New England gets the "miserable pittance" of 64 per cent. of his estimate for her rivers and harbors—some 17 per cent. higher than the average of the whole country; and the State of Maine, out of the whole bill, gets the enormous proportion of 80 per cent. of the Chief Engineer's estimate. Yet the committee having followed this rule, the only safe and intelligent rule to follow, the amount allowed to New England is called a "miserable and meager pittance." What does the gentleman from Maine want?

Mr. BOUTELLE. I will tell you.

Mr. COGSWELL. Does he want the earth, or to hear himself talk?

I dislike, Mr. Chairman, to discuss this bill upon any basis of a geographical analysis; it is neither fair nor intelligent to discuss it in that way, but the gentleman from Maine has forced that style of discussion upon me. I feel that his remarks reflect upon what I have tried to do, and ignore the generosity of my associates upon that committee. Why, sir, New England has been so well treated—so content was she that not a word have I heard, not a word will you hear, Mr. Chairman, from her in the way of complaint. She has been so well treated that I was remaining perfectly quiet in my seat in the hope that her good fortune in this matter would not be found out. [Laughter.] But the gentleman from Maine, like the precocious child at the tea-table, has let it out; and hence I have made these remarks. This committee has treated New England fairly, and New England appreciates it; for she believes in the motto "Live and let live," and whoever undertakes to voice her sentiments as otherwise misrepresents her from Maine to Connecticut.

One word more, Mr. Chairman, and I have done. It has never been my honor before the present session to sit with a committee of this House; but it has been my lot to sit with many legislative committees on important subjects, and I want to say (excepting myself always) of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, with whom I have had the honor to associate, that I have never met a committee devoted more fairly or ably or industriously, and with so little prejudice or favoritism, to its public duties as in my experience I have found the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of this House. [Applause.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Chairman, it is a very ungracious task to interfere with this delightful season of mutual admiration. I do not know anything more affecting in my brief experience in this House. The ardent affection with which these gentlemen of the River and Harbor Committee are attached to each other is a sight for gods and men. I have seen measures brought in here from every committee of this House, and very rarely has any bill come here from any of our committees concerning some provision of which some member of the committee has not felt at liberty to diverge, slightly perhaps, from the views of his associates. This committee is the one grand and glorious exception. Every member of this committee is satisfied that every other member is a patriot and a statesman and a river and harbor financier [laughter], and I am inclined to think that by the time we get through the consideration of this bill at least a portion of that claim will be recognized and conceded by the House and the country.

I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that I am not responsible for this remarkable degree of heat which has been developed among some of my associates on this side of the House. We had a corruscation from New York yesterday, and we have had an eruption from Massachusetts today. I come from a cold section of the country, where we do not allow ourselves to get excited on small occasions, and I do not propose to add anything to the fire-works of this discussion. My purpose is to hold this debate down, so far as I participate in it, to a consideration of cold facts; and while I would have preferred to avoid any criticism which might have caused even a momentary pang to my friend from New York [Mr. NUTTING] or my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. COGSWELL], for whom I have as sincere a regard as any person not associated with them on the Rivers and Harbors Committee can have (I hardly would claim to get up to that height), yet in criticising this bill I have been obliged by a sense of duty to my section and my State to complain of what I believe to be. notwithstanding the assertion of my friend from Massachusetts, a very inequitable recognition of the rights of my people.

And I say to the gentleman in all candor I do not share with him that exuberant degree of gratitude he has expressed to the Rivers and Harbors Committee for the liberality with which they have treated the State of Maine. [Laughter.] I want to say I do not regard $170,000 of appropriation——

Mr. COGSWELL rose.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I dislike to decline, but the gentleman would not permit me to interrupt him, and I must hold him to the rule of the Rivers and Harbors Committee courtesy. [Laughter.]

I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, I do not believe you will find any bonfires burning on the hill-tops of the State of Maine or any celebration in the harbors of that State for the enormous appropriation of $170,000 for a shore line of thousands of miles, including great harbors as well as some of the grandest rivers.

A MEMBER. Why did you not go before the committee?

Mr. BOUTELLE. I am responsible for my action and we will come to that in due time. I do not know that it is the duty of any gentleman of the House to ask that question to ascertain the reason, or for the committee to ask it. But I say, in all courtesy, this is a long bill and I can not do everything on one paragraph, but before we get through I will try to do justice to the subject and will come to that.

One hundred and sixty thousand dollars is appropriated for the rivers and harbors of the State of Maine. It is 10 per cent.—less than 10 per cent.——

Mr. WISE. Two hundred and seventy thousand dollars is the money appropriated by the committee for Maine.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I understand my friend from Virginia says the amount reported by the committee is $207,000.

Mr. WISE. No; $270,000.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. WISE. No; I beg your pardon.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I have carefully made a computation and find it is only $170,500. But even if the statement of the gentleman be true, if they swelled that appropriation up to $200,000, it would be less than one-half of the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers, which was $575,000.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BLANCHARD. I ask, by unanimous consent of the committee, that debate be considered as closed upon the pending paragraph.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving river at Greenport, N. Y.: Continuing improvement, $5,000.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I move to strike out the last word.

Now, Mr. Chairman, when interrupted I was saying this appropriation for the State of Maine is in the face of the official report of the Chief of Engineers and of the local engineers who made the examination, for more than $575,000. I do not feel very grateful for that. The very reports to which the gentleman has referred, as stated repeatedly in this book, object to having these small appropriations made; they state that it is a matter of extravagance to make these small appropriations for these works. For instance, in one case, a few years ago, when the committee made an appropriation of $10,000, I went before the committee with the official protest of the engineer against making appropriations so small, as he could not obtain bids at a reasonable and fair rate, but I obtained from that committee a very meager degree of satisfaction, which induced me to avoid taking that trouble this year.

My complaint is not simply of the neglect of my own State. I am not here pleading for appropriations for Maine. If there had been no appropriations made at all there would have been no complaint made by me. My complaint is that the distribution in this bill is obviously, is manifestly, is glaringly inequitable. Why, the case cited by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO] tells the whole story. I have no desire to pick out a case here and there or to make any special point against the appropriation of any individual on that committee, but when my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. COGSWELL] tells me the State of Maine and New England have received an excessive proportion of the appropriations in this bill, I ask him how he reconciles that with the fact that in Oswego the engineer recommended only $80,000, and yet the committee, with a degree of courtesy I can only attribute to the peculiar fraternity which exists amongst the members of that committee, increased it by $20,000? [Laughter.]

Now, my friend from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], in his very handsome and eloquent speech to-day, would seem to put me in the position of complaining that improvements have been made in West Virginia or in some other section of the country. I do not intend to be put in any such position. I do not intend to be put in any sectional position on this bill. If I can be shown a case where any great commercial river of this country or any great harbor of this country can be improved for commerce and business and trade by a liberal appropriation out of the United States Treasury, there is no man on this floor who will go further than I to make that appropriation.

But if I find a meager allowance, a meager recognition of well-established avenues of commerce, that are well known to be in need of improvements, while at the same time there is a lavishness, going to the point of absolute extravagance, in appropriations for doubtful projects, and for projects which have been discountenanced and denounced on this very floor, and by members representing the very sections in which they are to be placed, then I shall complain and protest against it, as I feel it my duty to do.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I want in this connection, because I am satisfied that my friend from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] proposes piecemeal to attack this bill at many points, to reply briefly to an allusion made by him yesterday to the appropriations for the State of Michigan. In his remarks he stated that over $2,000,000 were appropriated to the State of Michigan by this bill. I wish to say that one and a half millions provided in the bill are appropriated for the improvement of the great Hay Lake channel and the canal at Sault Ste. Marie. This is the great gateway of that region through which passes 75 per cent. of the commerce of eight great States and Territories west and northwest of the State of Michigan.

Mr. BOUTELLE. The gentleman will find that I recognized that fact.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. Very well; the gentleman says he recognized it; but did he recognize it when he stated that Michigan had so large a sum, when he might have stated that the large share of the sum named is really not for Michigan at all?

Mr. BOUTELLE. I so stated.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. But that they were for that almost limitless empire to the northwest of our great lakes. When the appropriations for these great works are deducted from the gentleman's estimate he will find that it leaves only about one-half million of dollars for the State of Michigan proper. And yet, Mr. Chairman, with that limited appropriation I want to tell my friend that we have to-day more coast line, by double, in extent than the State of Maine. We are surrounded by great interoceans upon whose bosoms float the commerce not only of the State of Michigan but of half a dozen of the vast States of the Northwest, and we have more water line than Maine.

And, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman forgets another thing, speaking as he does for Maine, because his entire burden is here that Maine and New England have not received their due share of recognition in these appropriations. He forgets that Maine has received appropriations from the Government of the United States for sixty years, to the extent, in the aggregate, of millions of dollars; and not only that, but the State of Maine was receiving money from the Treasury of the Government for her harbors when Michigan was a howling wilderness. Ay, receiving money long before the gentleman from Maine was born, or at least before he had reached the years of discretion——

A MEMBER. Has he? [Laughter.]

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. And the question is, will Maine ever be finished? Now, my friend from Maine, having received for his State for these two generations money for the rivers and harbors of his region, comes in and antagonizes the bill now pending because he does not receive as much as our great Northwestern region, for instance, and for that reason is opposing the bill step by step. Having got his share he does not propose to let others have anything. The gentleman's attitude reminds me of the story of the man who for forty years borrowed wheelbarrows from his neighbors, but when he finally got one of his own he put a placard upon his gate announcing, in emphatic terms, "I neither borrow nor lend wheelbarrows." [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, in order to appreciate exactly the meaning and the importance of this bill we must look beyond the limits of any State. You may take Maine and put her down into one of the great lakes that surround Michigan, and she would simply make a very beautiful small summer resort. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, when I believe that a committee of this House, made up as is this from a dozen different States of the Union, whether they come from Maine or from Louisiana, are corrupt, I will vote for nothing that they offer. But when I see conscientious work here by a committee I am bound to believe that their results are honestly arrived at, at least. We may spend the whole summer fighting the bill paragraph by paragraph, but if we do let us do it for other reasons than those my friend has so far offered.

Mr. LODGE. I was absent yesterday when the clause appropriating money to the harbor of Lynn, Mass., was passed. I desire to offer an amendment to that clause, and ask unanimous consent that I may offer that amendment now.

The CHAIRMAN. That can only be recurred to by unanimous consent.

Mr. LODGE. I ask unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to recur to the clause to which he has called attention in order to offer an amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. LODGE. The amendment I propose to offer makes no change in the amount of the appropriation.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I have seen the amendment which the gentleman proposes. It is only a verbal amendment, and I have no objection to its being offered.

There was no objection.

Mr. LODGE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 3, at the end of line 40, add the words "and a portion in the basin inclosed by the wharves of said city of Lynn."

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the clause be read as proposed to be amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving harbor at Lynn, Mass.: Continuing improvement, $10,000; a part of which may, in the discretion of the engineer, be used at the Point of Pines and in the western channel leading thereto, and a portion in the basin inclosed by the wharves of said city of Lynn.

The amendment was adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next paragraph.

The Clerk read lines 126 and 127, as follows:

Improving harbor at Oak Orchard, N. Y.: Continuing improvement and repairs, $6,000.

Mr. PAYSON. I feel inclined to begin with a parliamentary inquiry as to whether it would be in order to address one's remarks to the precise subject under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] for that purpose.

Mr. PAYSON. There is a larger audience than that in this Chamber paying some attention to what is being done with reference to this bill. The tax-payers of this country are interested in what we are doing now and here.

I take it, sir, that I utter only the unanimous opinion of the people of this country when I say that they indorse legitimate appropriations for river and harbor improvements. I do not forget that during the time I have been here the river and harbor bill varies with the change of the personnel of this House. We no longer hear upon this floor reference to the euphonious name of Kiskiminetas, in Pennsylvania. Reference to that river and its importance ceased when certain prominent gentlemen from the State of Pennsylvania went out from this body. I do not remember to have heard within the last two years anything said with reference to the importance of Cheesequake Creek, in New Jersey. The importance of that stream seems suddenly to have ended with the exit from this House of certain members from that State.

Mr. BUCHANAN. A certain member.

Mr. PAYSON. Perhaps; I am corrected—a certain member. The point I intended to make is that it may be in this bill, as in other bills which have been presented for consideration here, there may be some works which ought to be benefited by appropriations from the Treasury of the United States.

There may be—and I say it with no disrespect when I use the expression—there may be some chaff in this bill, and I believe there is; and it is the duty, if I may venture the suggestion, of members of this House to clear this bill from any such hindrances to its passage, so that when the bill shall go from this committee to the House it may be one to which we may all give our support.

In saying this I remember another thing, Mr. Chairman, that the party which I believe has always been the pioneer in behalf of liberal appropriations to internal improvements, the Republican party of this nation, have never been strict constructionists with reference to appropriations from the Federal Treasury in aid of works of national improvement. But, sir, with reference to many items in this bill, as it has been in the past with reference to objectionable items in other bills, I fear that for some reason, ignorance or otherwise, items have been incorporated in this bill that members of this body ought not to support, no matter how enthusiastic they may be with reference to the general subject that is involved.

Approaching the subject from that standpoint I call your attention, Mr. Chairman, and the attention of the House, to the item here being considered.

Here is an appropriation for—

Improving harbor at Oak Harbor, New York: Continuing improvement and repairs, $6,000.

I find by referring to the report of the Chief of Engineers that this improvement was begun in 1833. Transportation methods have been revolutionized since then; but we have gone on and expended nearly $100,000 in improving the harbor at this point, of the locality of which I am in utter ignorance. I simply know it is in the State of New York from the fact that it is so stated in the bill. But I find in the report of the Chief of Engineers that the total amount of tonnage to and from that port was carried in five small vessels. The total value of the exports from that port was $29! Think of it a moment. The total amount of exports from this port, for which we are asked to appropriate $6,000 in addition to nearly $100,000 heretofore appropriated and spent, is $29, and only five vessels, large or small, have entered or made their exit from the port during the year. Now, sir, as one who favors river and harbor improvements, one who is in favor of the most liberal appropriations for legitimate objects of that character, I ask somebody upon that committee to explain to this House the necessity of continuing appropriations from the Treasury of the United States for this purpose.

Mr. LONG. What are the imports?

Mr. PAYSON. The report of the Chief Engineer states that the value of the imports is $8,431.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SAWYER] in whose district this port is.

Mr. SAWYER. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad that the distinguished gentleman [Mr. PAYSON] has seen fit to select a little port in my district for the purpose of making a charge against the bill now under consideration.

Mr. PAYSON. Oh, I hope the gentleman will not think that I am doing this captiously. I am doing it in perfect good faith, and I give notice that a little later I hope to call attention to other items in other districts. I am seeking for information.

Mr. SAWYER. Well, I am simply talking about this item. I do not know what the gentleman may talk about hereafter.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the fact with reference to the port in question is, that as a port of refuge it is the most valuable port upon the southern shore of Lake Ontario, and the engineer in charge, located either at Oswego or Buffalo, appeared before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and made that statement.

True, it is not of so much value as a commercial port, but as a refuge in time of storm it is the most easily approached and altogether the best and safest harbor upon the whole southern shore of the lake. No other place on that shore of Ontario equals it as a port of refuge from storms, and it is on that account that appropriations have been made for it. There is a light-house there, a port of entry, and a custom-house. Two or three years ago almost all of the eastern pier of the harbor was carried away by a tremendous storm. An appropriation of $12,000 was made to rebuild that pier, and all that is asked for now by the friends of the harbor is simply an appropriation sufficient, with the amount appropriated by the last Congress, to perfect the improvement and preserve the harbor. That is all that we asked, and that is the appropriation that is made, and I hope that the gentleman [Mr. PAYSON] will select some other item for his criticism, and that he may be more fortunate in his selection than he has been in this case.

Mr. PAYSON. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. SAWYER. Certainly.

Mr. PAYSON. I see that by looking over the reports of the engineers, that during 1886-'87 only five vessels entered that port. Is the gentleman prepared to say that any other vessels entered during the year except those five?

Mr. SAWYER. I say that it is a daily occurrence in time of storm for vessels to enter that harbor for refuge, and frequently it occurs many times a day.

Mr. MILLIKEN. May I ask a question?

Mr. SAWYER. Certainly.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Is it a fact that vessels may go into that harbor and may go out again without entering at the custom-house?

Mr. SAWYER. I do not know about that; but I know that I have seen at one time more vessels in that harbor than are named in that report.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I think that after the explanation of the gentleman from the Orleans district [Mr. SAWYER] it will be conceded that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] did not make a very good point upon this item of appropriation. I was present in the committee when Captain Mahan, one of the best engineers on the Lakes, was before it, and when the question was directly put to him why, in view of the small commerce of this port, should there be any more appropriations made for it, and he replied that it was the only harbor of refuge, so far as he knew, on the whole south side of Lake Ontario, and that if it was competent for the committee to give the whole amount of money estimated for he believed it should be given to this harbor at once. The recommendation of the engineer, as I understood it, was $12,000, but the wisdom of the Chief of Engineers, or possibly of the committee, cut it down 50 per cent.; so the appropriation was put at $6,000.

And, Mr. Chairman, while I am speaking of harbors of refuge, I wish to say further that if gentlemen are going to hit them geographically all over this country, the same remarks which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] has made about Oak Orchard would apply with ten times more force to Sand Beach Harbor, in Michigan, where there is nothing but a harbor of refuge, yet where, if Western commerce and Western men could have their way before Congress and before its committees, there would be an appropriation four times larger than the Committee on Rivers and Harbors has ever given to that place. I believe Sand Beach deserves all it gets; and let me say to the committee that while there are appropriations for small harbors, and while I must say that there is seeming injustice in some of the appropriations, which I feel to a moderate extent myself, yet it should also be remembered that on the Great Lakes last year, on account of the niggardliness of the United States Government in providing harbors of refuge and harbors fit for a boat drawing 10 feet of water to enter, 204 men lost their lives on those lakes. That fact, I think, is a sufficient justification for the appropriation for Oak Orchard or any other of what are called the obscure ports provided for in this bill.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I ask that we have a vote on the pending proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the amendment is exhausted.

Mr. PAYSON. I withdraw the amendment and move to strike out the last word. I do that for the purpose of saying that the explanation given by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SAWYER], in whose district this harbor of Oak Orchard is, supplemented by the statement of the other gentleman from New York [Mr. FARQUHAR], shows the necessity of having sometimes a little more debate and a little more explanation of measures of this character than we have had on this bill. Those statements obviate the objection I made, and I withdraw the amendment.

Improving harbor at Ogdensburgh, N. Y.: Continuing improvement, $15,000.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. I move to amend by striking out "fifteen," in line 129, and inserting "ten."

I find in the Engineer's Report extending up to July 30, 1886, that including the appropriation for the fiscal year beginning then, there was on hand $10,272.90 available for this work. During that year there was expended, all told, including all outstanding liabilities on the 1st of July, 1887, $3,705.46, leaving on hand available for this work in July 1, 1887, $6,568.44.

Now, it seems, Mr. Chairman, that during previous years very much less than the amount asked for has been actually expended. Indeed, during the last fiscal year only $3,705 was expended, leaving on hand at the beginning of the present year nearly two-thirds of the appropriation made in 1886.

I find this same state of facts running through a large number of these items of appropriation. Turning back only two or three pages of this bill to the appropriation for Great Sodus Harbor, New York, I find that that work was inaugurated in 1829, and from that time till June 30, 1887, $399,000 had been expended. The amount expended from the adoption of the present project, in 1881, to June 30, 1887, a period of six years, was $41,844.68; and all of that was for pier work. The appropriation made for this work in 1886, the last one of this character, was $16,875, which, added to the amount on hand, made an aggregate of $18,517.76. During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, only $4,255.44 of this sum of over $18,000 seems to have been expended, leaving on hand $14,262.33 unexpended and available.

And then take the very next item, the appropriation for Little Sodus Harbor. There was on hand July 1, 1886, $2,418.28, and there was appropriated for that year $12,500, making an aggregate of $14,918.28 available for that work. On the 1st of July, 1887, there was still $14,193.08 of that money on hand available; so that during the fiscal year ending July 1, 1887, only $725.20 seems to have been expended.

Finding this state of facts with reference to so many of these appropriations——

Mr. BLANCHARD. In answer to the criticism of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. STONE] upon the appropriation for the harbor of Ogdensburgh, especially his statement that we have given for this harbor a larger amount than that in the bill of 1886, while the report shows that although only $10,000 was appropriated in 1886, $6,000 was on hand available for this improvement on the 1st of July, 1887, I will call his attention to the concluding portion of the paragraph from which he himself read. It says:

With the completion of the present contract during this working season there will have been some 150,000 cubic yards removed from the channels of this river at a cost of $34,543, consuming the available funds.

It thus appears that when we incorporated this appropriation in the bill there was nothing on hand to the credit of this harbor, except what was included in the existing contracts, which by this time have been completed; so that now there is nothing on hand to the credit of this harbor, and the gentleman's criticism is without foundation in fact.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, perhaps I should say a word on this proposition. I do not suppose that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. STONE] had any intention of striking at this harbor especially, but wishing to strike into the bill, he struck by accident at this point.

It is well known that the port of Ogdensburgh is located at the foot of slack-water navigation upon the lakes. No sailing vessels go below there except those capable of running through the Canadian canals or running the great rapids of the St. Lawrence. Consequently this is the lowest point where the slack-water navigation of the lakes touches and where freight for transportation is reshipped east and west. The value of the dutiable imports entered for consumption there during the year 1887 was something over $1,000,000. The amount of domestic merchandise exported there was over one million and a half of dollars. The total ascertained and estimated value of the commerce of the port is over $16,000,000. The number of entries of vessels was 1,330; the number of clearances, 1,296; the tonnage of vessels entered was over 280,000 tons, and there were clearances to the same amount. The corn entered at that harbor aggregated nearly 3,000,000 bushels; the lumber, more than 52,000,000 feet; lath, over six million and a half feet; shingles, nearly 3,000,000. And so I might go through the list. But it does not seem to be necessary to go on with this exhibit, because it is well known to any one who knows anything of the commerce of the Great Lakes that this is an important point—important to the East as well as to the West. Therefore I ask that this amendment be rejected. Perhaps a single additional statement should be made. The engineer in charge recommended the expenditure of $30,000 for the current year, and the Chief Engineer cut the amount down to $15,000 without explanation.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. STONE, of Missouri, it was rejected.

Mr. PARKER. I desire to offer a verbal amendment to which there is no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 128 insert after the words "New York," the words "including the clearing out of the mouth of the Oswegatchie River."

Mr. PARKER. This follows the appropriation of last year.

Mr. BLANCHARD. There is no objection to that.

The amendment of Mr. PARKER was agreed to.

Improving harbor at Oleott, N. Y.: Continuing improvement, $5,000.

Mr. PAYSON. I move to strike that out. Now, Mr. Chairman, this improvement was begun in 1866, and there had been expended on it down to the 30th of June, 1887, $28,000. The amount of commerce there was during the last fiscal year shown by the report of the Board of Engineers to have been as follows: Value of exports in that year, $1,929; value of imports, $500; and the total amount of revenue collected, $17. [Laughter.] It does seem to me, Mr. Chairman, there ought to be some explanation from somebody as to the necessity for the further continuance of this work. How can a harbor be of national importance where the total amount of revenue collected is only $17, and the total value of all merchandise imported or exported in round numbers is only $2,000?

It does seem to me, before this should be permitted to remain, and especially after it has been in existence for twenty years, and upon which has been expended nearly $30,000, some explanation ought to be given to the House.

Mr. DINGLEY. Is not the gentleman aware of the fact this harbor is useful to a large coastwise trade? Not a single dollar of revenue is collected from the coastwise trade.

Mr. PAYSON. I understand there is a coastwise trade there to the extent of thousands of dollars, but according to the returns there were only eighteen vessels, most of them small vessels, which entered there.

Mr. DINGLEY. Of course the gentleman knows only vessels in the foreign trade are entered at the custom-house.

Mr. PAYSON. I am aware of that fact, but the entries and departures from that port I take from the report of the engineer.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Many vessels belonging to the coastwise trade enter and depart from that harbor which are not entered in the custom-house.

Mr. PAYSON. I am aware of that fact, but nevertheless the point which I have made of the great expense already incurred at this place and the small amount of revenue collected makes some explanation necessary why we should longer continue this appropriation.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WEBER. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have the highest regard for the opinion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] on the land question, and he knows that fact because I told him so myself this morning. [Laughter.] But I regret I am unable to pay him the same compliment so far as the improvements of our harbors are concerned.

I am glad he has called attention to the pending paragraph, for it enables me to condemn as strongly as I can this method of appropriating for Government work, which no doubt has been brought about by just such obstructions as we have witnessed since this bill was taken up for consideration.

This work, sir, was commenced, it is true, some years ago. It was long before I came to Congress, and for which I am not responsible. This progress, at a mere snail's pace, has been caused simply by the recommendations of the engineers in its behalf, being cut down to fit the public idea as to the whole amount which should be appropriated for this purpose.

Now, sir, the improvements on the upper lakes and the channels connecting those lakes have been in advance of the improvements made upon these small harbors. That, perhaps, is the reason why there are such meager figures in this case. The depth of water there is only 7 feet, which was ample a few years ago for the purpose of commerce; but there has been since then, as I have already stated, marvelous improvements made in the channels on the upper lakes, enabling our people to float a heavier tonnage than they could before. When the improvements were first begun 600 tons burden was, perhaps, the largest of lake vessels, but now 100,000 bushels of grain are transported upon vessels of 3,000 tons burden. I presume when these other improvements have been completed the vessels which now float upon Lake Ontario will be able to enter this harbor, which was originally designed as a harbor of refuge, and which has afforded shelter and protection to a vast amount of coastwise trade.

In the report of the engineers there are four harbors on that lake which are designed as harbors of refuge, the importance of which will increase when the Welland Canal has been completed, and when the House consents these appropriations shall be enlarged so as to increase the depth of water, which will enable the vessels floating upon the upper lakes to enter into it. If the gentleman will go with me and strike out "$5,000" and put in the amount the engineer claims as necessary, and which he says he can profitably expend, I believe he would be doing a better work than in attempting to strike out the appropriations.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving harbor at Oswego, N. Y.: Continuing improvement and repairs, $100,000; of which $15,000 shall be used in removing the east breakwater at the mouth of the river.

Mr. SOWDEN. I move to strike out, in line 133, the words "one hundred" and insert "eighty."

Upon an examination of the engineer's reports it appears that on July 1, 1887, there was an amount on hand and available for the purpose of this improvement, under the appropriation act of August 5, 1886, of $62,737.78.

That is to say, the amount available for repairs was $47,737.78; and for continuing the improvement $15,000. We have now his estimate here in which he says it will require for the completion of this project $79,612.00.

Is it true that there is on hand an unexpended balance of $62,737.78 of the moneys appropriated for this improvement under the act of August 5, 1886? If so, it strikes me that the amount to be appropriated by this bill should not exceed the difference between the said sum of $62,737.78 and $79,612, the amount of the engineer's estimate for the completion of this work, or $16,874.22. If it be otherwise, that the entire amount required for the completion of this project be $79,612, and the engineer reports that the amount that can be profitably expended upon this work in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, is only $80,000, why is it that this committee report and ask at the hands of this House an appropriation of $100,000?

I would like the chairman of the committee to explain this question, if he can, or the gentleman from New York [Mr. NUTTING], who is himself a member of the committee, and who represents the district in which the Oswego Harbor is located.

Mr. NUTTING. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the condition of mind of my friend from Pennsylvania upon this question. But I think I can satisfy him in a very few words that he is wrong.

I want to say to the gentleman and to the House that the Chief of Engineers has, in a supplemental report, reported that it will take $80,000 to repair the breach in the harbor which now endangers the whole structure, and the commerce of the port; and that it is absolutely necessary that this work should be done at once. The $80,000, then, is for the repair of the breach. He says also that the obnoxious pier, which is an obstruction in the mouth of the harbor, will require $15,000 for its removal. I may say for the information of the gentleman from Pennsylvania and of the House that this obstruction in the mouth of the harbor has within the last ten years been the cause of the death of two persons and the destruction of seven vessels. There is the $80,000 necessary to preserve the harbor itself; there is the $15,000 to take out the obstruction from the mouth of the harbor, making $95,000, leaving only $5,000 of the $100,000 appropriated to be used for the ordinary repairs of the breakwater of a harbor that has a mile and a quarter of piers.

Those are the exact facts in regard to the matter; and I will say further to the gentleman that the report of the Chief Engineer shows his recommendation for this harbor to be $160,000, and yet there is appropriated but $100,000. That is my answer to him.

I ask to have printed upon this question, as a part of my remarks, the resolution of the House calling for the supplemental report and the report itself.

Mr. NUTTING submitted the following resolution:

Whereas it appears by the report of Chief of Engineers in regard to river and harbor improvements for 1887 that about 150 linear feet of the west breakwater or pier in the harbor of Oswego, N. Y., has been swept away;

It also appears that between two and three hundred linear feet of the east breakwater or pier in said harbor has been built; and

Whereas it is alleged that the above-described breach in the said breakwater, in time of storm, allows the sea to come into the inner harbor to the extent that commerce (and vessels with the property connected therewith) is endangered; it is also alleged by sailors and masters of vessels frequenting said harbor that the said portion of the east pier or breakwater already built is too near the west breakwater, thereby making the channel necessarily passed by vessels so narrow that in heavy weather, with west-northwest winds, all vessels are in danger in passing through, and that in fact since the building of said part of said east breakwater vessels have been wrecked because of the position of the said east pier or breakwater: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Secretary of War, by the Chief of Engineers aforesaid, be, and he is hereby, requested, if consistent with the public welfare, to report to this House—

1. Whether the said breached part of said breakwater or pier ought at once to be repaired; and, if so, what the cost of such repair will be.

2. Whether in the opinion of the engineers the said east breakwater, so called, now erected in the mouth of the river, does endanger vessels entering said harbor, and whether vessels have been injured and wrecked on said east pier, and whether said pier ought or ought not to be removed, and if it ought to be removed, what the cost of such removal will be.

3. Whether the $80,000 recommended in the engineer's report for 1887 to be appropriated to Oswego Harbor by Congress at this session includes the expenditures necessary to repair said west breakwater and remove said east breakwater, if the said pier or breakwater should be repaired and removed.

4. What the Chief of Engineers recommends Congress to appropriate for the benefit of Oswego Harbor, and the amounts and particular purposes for which said money should be expended, including the repair of said west pier or breakwater and the removal of said east pier, if such piers ought to be repaired and removed.

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington City, March 3, 1888.

The Secretary of War has the honor to transmit to the House of Representatives a report of the 1st instant, with its inclosure, from the Chief of Engineers, relative to the cost of repairing the west pier or breakwater at Oswego Harbor, New York, and the necessity and cost of removing the east breakwater now erected in the mouth of the river, stating that the $80,000 estimated in his report for 1887 included the removal of the east pier or breakwater, but not the repairs to the west breakwater; and submitting an estimate for the improvement of Oswego Harbor to take the place of the one in his annual report for 1887, the same being transmitted in response to House resolution of the 24th ultimo, calling for this information.

WILLIAM C. ENDICOTT,
Secretary of War.

The SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS, UNITED STATES ARMY,
Washington, D. C., March 1, 1888.

SIR: In answer to the reference to this office of the resolution of House of Representatives of February 24, in regard to the further prosecution of the public works at the harbor of Oswego, I have the honor to submit the following replies to the questions therein asked, namely:

"1. Whether the said breached part of said west breakwater or pier ought at once to be repaired, and, if so, what the cost of such repair will be?"

Answer. The repairs to the west pier or breakwater are absolutely necessary. The cost of these repairs is estimated by the officer in charge at $80,000.

"2. Whether in the opinion of the engineers the said east breakwater, so called, now erected in the mouth of the river, does endanger vessels entering said harbor, and whether vessels have been injured and wrecked on said east pier, and whether said pier ought or ought not to be removed, and if it ought to be removed, what the cost of such removal will be."

In answer I beg leave to submit herewith printed pages 2386 to 2391, detached from the annual report of this office for 1887, which contain a report dated December 15, 1886, from Capt. C. F. Palfrey, Corps of Engineers, in charge of this improvement, and a report dated February 15, 1887, from the permanent Board of Engineers, to whom the subject of the removal of the east breakwater was referred, and to add my concurrence in the opinion of the board that this breakwater should be removed.

It is proper to state that the construction of the breakwater having been sanctioned by Congress, no steps can be taken by this Department for its removal until Congress so directs by proper legislation.

"3. Whether the $80,000 recommended in the Engineer's report for 1887 to be appropriated to Oswego Harbor by Congress at this session includes the expenditures necessary to repair said west breakwater and remove said east breakwater, if the said pier or breakwater should be repaired and removed."

Answer. The $80,000 estimated in the annual report of this office for the year 1887 included the removal of the east pier or breakwater, but not the repairs to the west breakwater.

"4. What the Chief of Engineers recommends Congress to appropriate for the benefit of Oswego Harbor, and the amounts and particular purposes for which said money should be expended, including the repair of said west pier or breakwater and the removal of the said east pier, if such piers ought to be repaired and removed."

Answer. Should Congress sanction the removal of the east pier, the following estimate is submitted to take the place of the one in the annual report of 1887, namely:

For continuing existing works and repairs	$65,000
For removal of east breakwater	15,000
To which add for repair of the great breach in the west breakwater	80,000

The attention of Congress has been invited in previous annual reports to the repair of the great breach and an estimate submitted.

The resolution of the House of Representatives is herewith returned.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. C. DUANE,
Brigadier-General, Chief of Engineers.

Hon. WILLIAM C. ENDICOTT,
Secretary of War.

Mr. KERR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last clause of that section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that there is an amendment pending.

Mr. KERR. I move this as an amendment to the pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his amendment.

Mr. KERR. To strike out the words:

Shall be used in removing the east breakwater at the mouth of the river.

It seems from this item in the bill that it is proposed to use $15,000 for doing away with improvements that have been heretofore made.

Mr. NUTTING. That is true.

Mr. KERR. Now it seems to me that this perhaps illustrates as forcibly as anything that could be found for that purpose the impropriety of a large majority of these improvements that are presented here for the consideration of the House in these bills, and without any adequate consideration by the engineers. Here is perhaps an improvement costing hundreds of thousands of dollars for all that we know, money expended heretofore by this Government in making the breakwater there; and now the gentleman from New York comes in and asks that $15,000 more of the people's money shall be appropriated to take it away after it has been made.

Now, in connection with that I wish to call the attention of the committee to the report accompanying this bill. Here is a bill embracing four hundred items of expenditure that are asked to be provided for by this Congress, and yet there is not one particle of recommendation in the report of this committee upon any single one of the items of expenditure. I say that it is not just to ask the members of this body to vote upon a proposition coming from a committee of this House without having any light thrown upon it in order that we may judge of the propriety of the action we are asked to take. And that, moreover, Mr. Chairman, I again suggest, shows the impropriety of these omnibus bills for the improvement of little creeks and rivers throughout the various parts of the country that are asked of the National Government, and that are of no consequence whatever except to the locality; and many of them, no doubt, are undertaken by the party in power for the purpose of getting work for hands that may be used in the election and for the increased power of the party.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. KERR. I have but a very few brief moments.

Mr. WASHINGTON. I only want to ask the gentleman if he has any creek or river in the district.

Mr. KERR. I have not; and I do not wish my people to be taxed in order that the gentleman's creeks and rivers may be improved. We had forty years ago in Iowa a great river running from the northwestern corner of the State of Iowa across the State, and thousands and thousands of dollars of the money of the United States were expended in improving that river; and it has all been lost. And millions and millions more will be lost if these appropriations asked for in the river and harbor bill are allowed. I hold that it is wise to engage in a generous system of internal improvements if they are improvements of national importance. But the proposition brought forward by one of these gentlemen shows how this river and harbor bill has been brought about. Every member of this House has been invited to go before that committee and ask if he had not some scheme; and nearly three-fourths of them as is shown by the items of the bill have appeared before the committee and have succeeded in having their schemes incorporated; and three-fourths of them on account of the little piece of pork that they had in the bill are ready to vote for its passage.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I wish to say that if the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, or some member of it, does not reply to some criticisms, such as that now passed on the bill, it is simply because we do not desire to take up the time of the committee. I hope there will be a vote.

Mr. SOWDEN. I would like to understand, and I ask the gentleman from New York, who represents the committee, where the report of the Secretary of War submitted to the House contains an estimate including $160,000 for the improvement of Oswego Harbor?

Mr. NUTTING. I will show it to the gentleman with great pleasure.

Mr. SOWDEN. I find that this project was commenced in 1827, and that the total amount expended since the date of the first appropriation to June 30, 1887, is $1,572,754.89. The amount expended since the adoption of the project in 1870 to June 30, 1887, is $1,099,422.16.

In the Engineer's report also I find it stated that in December, 1884, a severe northwest storm caused a breach in the west breakwater 145 feet in width, and necessitating repairs for 100 feet on each side of the breach.

We have here submitted an estimate of the Chief of Engineers of $80,000 to make the repairs; and we have an appropriation of $100,000 in this bill. Now, I would like the gentleman who represents the committee having this bill in charge to explain to this House why it is that he asks an appropriation of $100,000 to make repairs which the Chief Engineer, having the matter in charge, says can be done for $80,000; why there should be an appropriation of $20,000 more upon this particular harbor than the officers in charge of the improvement ask at the hands of this Congress.

Mr. FARQUHAR. In reply to a remark of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KERR], who was very broad in his statements, I desire to say that while I represent on this floor one of the greatest commercial districts of the country I never was invited to appear before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and never have been a party to any schemes or jobs before that committee. I never knew how much was to be appropriated to the harbor of Buffalo until I saw it in the printed bill. I wash my hands completely of being implicated in any such broad assertions, and of any charge that I have been a party in any way to bring influences together for my own harbor or any other.

Mr. KERR. I made that statement because one of the members of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors had stated that every member had been invited before it, and I knew I had been invited, although I had no desire to go before the committee.

Mr. BOUTELLE rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KERR] withdraw his amendment?

Mr. KERR. I do.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I renew the amendment in order to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. COGSWELL] how the rule of 50 per cent. was applied in this case. I understood the gentleman from Massachusetts to state that this bill was constructed on the basis of a uniform rule of inserting in the bill an appropriation equal to 50 per cent. on the recommendation of the engineer. How is that rule applied to this item?

Mr. COGSWELL. In reply to the question of the gentleman from Maine, I will say I suppose he can ascertain with due diligence the per cent. that $19,500,000 bore to $40,000,000. It is about 47 per cent. That was the rule that, with hardly an exception, was followed by the committee.

Mr. MCADOO. I do not wish to be misunderstood because of my criticisms of this bill. There is no gentleman on the floor of the House who is more strictly in favor of the legitimate improvement of rivers and harbors of the United States than I am. But what I object to, and what many other gentlemen object to, are the glaring inconsistencies which appear in these bills as annually brought to the attention of the House and the country.

I heartily agree with what was said, and very ably said, by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] when he said that the proper spirit in which to approach this bill is not one of captious criticism or mere platitudinal objections, but that we should point out to this House and this House should give its attention to the inconsistencies of the bill and to the appropriations which are not needed for harbors that are almost mythical.

I sincerely trust, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment which has been offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SOWDEN] with regard to the item we are now considering will be adopted. The engineer himself states to the House, through the committee, that only $80,000 can be profitably expended at the point in question. Why, therefore, should this House vote $20,000 out of the public Treasury as an additional amount to what the engineer recommends, for a harbor which, as I have proven by the figures, has been steadily decreasing in its commercial importance?

Now, sir, there is great force in the objection made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KERR]. It is only a few years ago that the United States, upon the advice of this very Board of Engineers, erected the east breakwater which now protects a part of the harbor of Oswego. I think it was in 1882 that the appropriation was made, and a very liberal and large one it was, for the erection of that breakwater. We were then told that it was absolutely necessary for the protection of their port that this breakwater should be constructed by the Government, but now we are asked to devote $15,000 of the public money for the purpose of removing that which but a few years ago by a vote of this House was constructed at the entrance to this harbor.

Mr. Chairman, as this debate has progressed I am glad to say that I find that the scriptural ingratitude of the lepers is not shown among the beneficiaries of this bill. We are told in the New Testament that out of the ten lepers that were healed only one returned to give thanks, but the beneficiaries of this bill on this floor, unlike the scriptural lepers, are gushing in their gratitude for the favors they have received. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SOWDEN].

Mr. BRYCE. Mr. Speaker, I agree with the remarks of my friend from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO] in what he says about the inconsistency of this bill. Why should this House vote $20,000 more than the Board of Engineers call for in favor of Oswego, when New York is allowed less than the estimates of the same board?

As regards the harbor of New York, the estimate of the Board of Engineers calls for $540,000, but it only allowed $380,000. Sandy Hook is the main entrance to New York. The various channels have ample breadth but are all shallowing, while the draught of vessels is rapidly increasing. New York collects about 60 per cent. of the entire revenue, therefore her supremacy becomes of national importance, and it becomes of national importance that ships can get into her harbor. At present our large steamers are obliged to wait off the bar at Sandy Hook until the tide is at the highest, and vessels have been known to wait two days. With the gradual increase in size of our ocean steamers it will soon be impossible for them to approach New York at all unless these channels are deepened.

As regards Buttermilk Channel, but $30,000 are allowed by this bill-while $50,000 are asked for. Colonel McFarland observes of Buttermilk Channel, and I quote from Mr. COX, that the large and increasing traffic of this part of the river warrants the removal of the whole shoal at a cost of $115,000.

As to Gowanus Bay channels, the allowance is but half of the engineer's estimate, while Colonel McFarland observes, again, that these channels ought to be increased now to 21 feet at low water and their width to 400 feet. This recommendation is made in view of the great increase in the size of vessels generally.

Now, gentlemen, I do not wish to antagonize this bill further than to put in my protest against the distribution of the various amounts contained in it, which gives, in my opinion, so little to the important places and so much to insignificant ones.

The House divided on the amendment of Mr. SOWDEN; and there were—ayes 36, noes 79.

Mr. SOWDEN. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The point being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will appoint to act as tellers the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SOWDEN] and the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD].

Mr. SOWDEN (before the count was completed). Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of no quorum on condition that the supplemental report of the Chief of Engineers be read for the information of the House.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Chairman, I send to the Clerk's desk to be read the supplemental report in relation to Oswego Harbor, which was referred to by the gentleman from New York [Mr. NUTTING] in his remarks, but which the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SOWDEN] did not hear. It shows that instead of $80,000 the engineers asked for $160,000.

The supplemental report, already printed in the remarks of Mr. NUTTING, was read.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Chairman, replying to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO], I will state that the basis of the appropriations recommended by the committee is the estimate of the Chief of Engineers. But in the case of Oswego Harbor, this House adopted a resolution of inquiry asking the Secretary of War whether the amount stated in the Book of Estimates as coming from the Chief of Engineers would be sufficient to do the work needed in that harbor. The Committee on Rivers and Harbors is not responsible, of course, for the action of the House, which deliberately adopted a resolution of inquiry addressed to the Secretary of War on this subject. In response to that resolution there came to the House an estimate of the War Department, showing that there was needed for this harbor $160,000 instead of $80,000 as stated in the Book of Estimates. The House referred that reply of the Secretary of War to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and we were compelled to take notice of it.

Mr. MCADOO. I did not know the inquiry was made by the House; I thought it was simply a committee inquiry.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill.

The following was read:

Improving New York Harbor, New York: Continuing improvement, $380,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the agreement of yesterday, the line just read will be passed over informally.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving harbor at Glen Cove, N. Y., $20,000.

Mr. SPINOLA. I move to amend by striking out the paragraph just read and inserting the following:

Improving harbor of Glen Cove, $10,000.
Improving and completing breakwater at entrance to Port Jefferson Harbor, $10,000.

Mr. Chairman, I ask the Committee of the Whole to adopt this amendment, for the reason that I was necessarily absent four months from my seat in the House and was unable to appear before the committee to present this claim in behalf of the breakwater at Port Jefferson Harbor. This amendment does not increase the appropriation, but simply divides it, leaving the amount the same as now proposed in the bill.

Mr. BLANCHARD. As the amendment does not increase the amount of appropriation, the committee will not object.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving harbor at New Rochelle, N. Y.: Continuing improvement, the balance remaining on hand from former appropriations to be expended in pursuance of the project adopted in 1871.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I desire to offer a verbal amendment. I move to correct the date in the last line of this paragraph by striking out "1871" and inserting "1881."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the preservation and protection of the peninsula of Presque Isle, Erie Harbor, Pennsylvania, as recommended by the Chief of Engineers, January 13, 1885, and in accordance with such plans as the Secretary of War may prescribe, $60,000.

Mr. RANDALL. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving the harbor of Philadelphia; for the removal of Smith's Island, and Windmill Island, in the State of Pennsylvania, and Petty's Island, in the State of New Jersey, or such parts of them as may be required, and for the improvement of the harbor between the cities of Philadelphia, Pa., and Camden, N. J., $250,000: Provided, That no part of this sum shall be expended until the title to the lands forming said islands shall be acquired and vested in the United States without charge.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, I submit this amendment in obedience to what I believe to be the united voice of the people of the city that I have the honor in part to represent on this floor. The warrant for the amendment grows out of a law authorizing a survey with a view to the removal of these obstructions in the Delaware River between the cities of Camden and Philadelphia. The bulk of the land mentioned in the amendment is located in the district which I represent. All the commercial and official bodies of the city of Philadelphia and representative bodies from the city of Camden and the State of New Jersey have heretofore appeared before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and made plain the absolute necessity for this appropriation, and I think I am justified in saying that the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, if they had been in possession of the report when the bill was framed, would have reported this paragraph as a part of it.

I wish to say, however, that the proviso does not meet the approval of the Representatives from Philadelphia. They feel that, in view of the past liberality of the city of Philadelphia in presenting to the Federal Government, at a cost of $1,000,000, a large naval depot, our city should not have been called upon to contribute means for the purchase of these islands, but that the Government, this being a national and public work, should have been willing to pay for this property. I found a resolute purpose in the Committee on Rivers and Harbors against entering upon any such expenditure in connection with this work; therefore I yielded to that condition, in regard to which I believe the committee, with one exception, adhered. I think I can now say—and if I do not correctly state the position of the committee I hope the chairman or some member of it will correct me—that the proposition now presented meets the approval of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Chairman, in the early part of the proceedings of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors a delegation came before us from the city of Philadelphia, urging the inadequacy of the appropriations in behalf of the commerce down there. It was alleged that Smith's, Petty's, and Windmill Islands, in front of the city, and between it and the Jersey shore, should be removed. This was a matter of great importance, and so impressed was the committee there existed a real necessity to do something to enlarge the harbor of the second port of our country that a report was made to the House, appropriating $5,000 to defray the expense of a special survey to be made of those islands, in order to ascertain what the cost would be of buying them and what the cost would be of removing them. The House unanimously adopted the resolution for that purpose, and the Secretary of War appointed a board of special engineers, who visited the harbor of Philadelphia and sat in judgment upon the proposed projects for the removal of those islands. But that report did not reach the House until after the river and harbor bill had been reported by the committee and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and placed upon the Calendar.

Now there can be no question of the necessity and great importance of the removal of these islands to the commerce of the city of Philadelphia, and I think I am safe in saying had that report of the engineers reached the Committee on Rivers and Harbors before the bill had been reported, the committee would have incorporated in it a sum at least as large as the one proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] in his pending amendment.

It was proposed by a portion of the delegation from the city of Philadelphia which waited upon the Committee on Rivers and Harbors that the Government should buy these islands and then remove them. The committee, while they did not sit in formal judgment on it, were almost unanimously against it. We thought that while these islands should be removed from the water front of the city, the city should first purchase them, in order that there should be no expense to the General Government for the land forming those islands; and after they were purchased and the title vested in the United States, then we should undertake the work of their removal. That is what is proposed by the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], with the proviso that no part of the money shall be expended until the title to these islands has been placed in the General Government without cost to it.

I repeat that the Committee on Rivers and Harbors would have put in this item had the report of the special engineers reached them before their bill had been reported and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and placed upon the Calendar; and under the circumstances I do not feel the committee can make strenuous objection to the amendment which has been offered. This matter came to us by the order of the House, but reached us after the bill was reported. I again repeat that had it reached us before the bill had been reported we would have inserted it for the same amount.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to state, Mr. Chairman, in support of the strong position taken in favor of this proposition, that the port of Philadelphia pays into the Treasury from customs duties about $18,000,000 a year. There is, besides, an enormous coastwise trade constantly going up and down the Delaware River or lying at the wharves of Philadelphia.

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Chairman, the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors made a lucid and forcible statement of the facts in this case. An appropriation would have been included in the bill equal to that proposed by my colleague for the improvement of this harbor if the report had come in time. We had a very large delegation of Philadelphians before us representing all the great commercial interests of that city and representing the transportation interest, and it was made to appear to the committee there was very great necessity for the improvement of the channel at that port.

The river has become too narrow to accommodate the large vessels that are now carrying on the commerce of that great city. The removal of these islands, which stand out in the middle of the river and between the cities of Philadelphia and Camden, has simply become a matter of absolute necessity in view of the commerce of that city, and in view, as I have already said, of the large vessels engaged in it.

There is nothing in this bill which will more commend it to the people of this country and their great commercial interests than the adoption of the amendment which has been offered by my colleague. The report of the Board of Engineers is full, clear, and explicit. I myself believe that the Government of the United States should purchase these islands. I do not see why the city of Philadelphia should be obliged to do that; but my colleague from the city has consented to that proposition, and it will be a very clever thing for Philadelphia to do if she consents to purchase the islands and give them to the Government, and only requiring that the Government shall expend the necessary amount for the removal of the islands and the deepening of the water way to facilitate the commerce of the river.

Mr. KERR. What does the report say about the cost of removal?

Mr. BAYNE. It does not give it exactly, but is estimated. I understand the ultimate cost will be about $3,500,000.

Mr. KERR. That is a large sum.

Mr. BAYNE. It is true, Mr. Chairman, that this is a very large sum; but compared with the advantages that will accrue to the harbor and to the people of the country it is but a small sum. The fact is, it has become absolutely necessary that these islands should be removed, and in view of the fact that Philadelphia pays $30,000,000 annually into the Treasury, and with the removal of these obstructions will doubtless largely increase this annual payment to the Government, there is no reason whatever why the city should not have the advantage of an appropriation to afford her commerce the facilities it so much requires. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I favor the amendment of my colleague appropriating $250,000 for the removal from the Delaware River Smith's and Windmill Islands, in the State of Pennsylvania, and Petty's Island, in the State of New Jersey. The first two islands are in the city of Philadelphia, within the boundaries of the Congressional district represented by my colleague. I, as a member from a Philadelphia district, feel an equal interest with my colleague in having this improvement commenced and carried to completion. The condition contained in the amendment requiring that the title to these islands should be put in the United States free of expense is a hard condition; but the River and Harbor Committee having decided that they could not favor the amendment in any other shape, my colleague assents to that form of it, as do I. Indeed, I look upon my colleague's amendment as part of the original bill, and the Committee of the Whole should consider it in that light, a joint resolution having been passed February 17 last creating a special commission of United States engineers to report upon the feasibility of the improvement and its cost. Eminent engineers composed the board, and the report was favorable. It came to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors after the river and harbor bill had been reported—too late to incorporate it in the provisions of the bill—but, as you have heard from its chairman and my colleague of the committee [Mr. BAYNE], it would have been inserted.

Mr. Chairman, this proposition to remove these islands came before that committee in a bill presented by my colleague [Mr. RANDALL], but its adoption was urged before the committee by all the commercial boards of Philadelphia, and the intelligent manner in which it was presented by them made a favorable impression upon the committee, and the result now is apparent, as the committee unanimously consent to the passage of the amendment. Philadelphia with its large commerce has not the wharfage to-day to accommodate the large steam-ships and sailing vessels from foreign ports, and with the immense coastwise fleet coming to the port the removal of these islands is a necessity. Proper width and depth of channel and piers of adequate length and size, especially on the city river front, can only be accomplished by the improvement now proposed. I hope the Committee of the Whole will adopt the amendment.

Mr. KERR. Mr. Chairman, I trust the House will consider that this is not an expenditure of only $250,000, as proposed here, but is a proposition as to whether Congress is prepared to enter upon an expenditure of three and a half millions of dollars for this purpose. It is very evident from the nature of this proposition that the expenditure will be entirely worthless unless the whole amount is appropriated.

Mr. BAYNE. Oh, no; the gentleman is entirely mistaken about that.

Mr. KERR. I understand the sum is for the removal of the islands.

Mr. BAYNE. No; this is for widening the river, and to that extent will benefit the commerce of the city.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. RANDALL, it was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving ice-harbor at Marcus Hook, Pennsylvania: Continuing improvement, $15,000.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

Insert after line 173:
"For constructing breakwater at Bar Harbor, Maine, $50,000."

Mr. BLANCHARD. I must make the point of order upon the amendment that it is not germane to that portion of the bill. It pertains to the State of Maine, and we are now considering appropriations for Pennsylvania.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Is it not proper to make the amendment in any part of this section of the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that it would come in more properly in the portion of the bill pertaining to Maine.

Mr. BAYNE. We will reach that part of the bill after awhile which relates to the rivers of Maine.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Yes; but we will not go to the harbors of Maine again.

I think this amendment is in order, but will of course accept the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that, while this would more properly come in in another section of the bill, the amendment is in order here.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Then I ask the gentleman from Maine to withhold it until we reach that portion of the bill referring to the rivers in Maine.

Mr. MILLIKEN. If that will satisfy the committee better I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will then be temporarily withdrawn.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

Improving the inland water way between New Berne and Beaufort, N. C.: Continuing improvement, $15,000.

Mr. SIMMONS. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out $15,000 and insert $25,000.

Mr. SIMMONS. The State of North Carolina in the year 1826, by cutting a canal of about three and one-half miles in length, beginning on the one side at the head of the navigable waters of Harlowe River and on the other side at the head of the navigable waters of Clubfoot River, connected the waters of Pamlico Sound with those of Beaufort Harbor. That canal was very small, and was only of sufficient depth and width to admit of the passage of small vessels. But it was found that it was a very great convenience to the people, and was very much used until some time just before the beginning of the war, when the locks broke down and it went out of use.

Several years ago Congress, with the view of connecting the waters of Pamlico Sound with those of Beaufort Harbor, so as to avoid the dangerous shoals of Hatteras and Cape Lookout, on the North Carolina coast, authorized a survey of the several projected routes for connecting the waters of Pamlico Sound with Beaufort Harbor. That was made, and the old canal channel authorized by the Legislature of North Carolina, and appropriated for, was approved and recommended.

This enterprise is not only a work of local but it is a work of national concern as well. When it is opened it will connect not only the waters of Chesapeake Bay with those of Beaufort Harbor, but it will furnish the now only missing link between the great harbor of New York and the harbor of Beaufort, N. C., thus affording through inland navigation from that great center of commerce, so as to avoid the dangerous part of the North Carolina coast. It will be apparent to any one who is at all familiar with the dangers of the North Carolina coast, and with the general character of the coast from New York to Beaufort Harbor, that some such route as this is needed for the small coasting vessels plying between the cities of the Atlantic coast and the great centers of trade, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Norfolk. Not only this, Mr. Chairman, but this work when completed will be of great benefit to the United States in case of a war with a foreign country, not only affording protection for vessels engaged in general commerce but affording protection for its fleet of war.

Mr. MCCLAMMY was recognized, and yielded his time to Mr. SIMMONS.

Mr. SIMMONS. Now, Mr. Chairman, the engineer, in his report upon the survey, says that the Government by expending the sum of $883,000 can secure a channel from one of these sounds to the other of 9 feet in depth and 80 feet in width, but he does not recommend in the report which I now have before me so extensive a work on the part of the Government.

He says, however, that it is of great importance from a national point of view, and he recommends that for the present the Government, by the expenditure of $90,000, which he says will be amply sufficient, shall begin this work by securing a channel between these points of 5 feet in depth and 30 feet in width.

Personally I am acquainted with the character of the soil along this canal, and I agree with the engineer when he says in this report that the great bulk of this $90,000 ought to be appropriated at once.

Now, the committee have only allowed $15,000 for this work. The soil is of a marshy character. And I undertake to say that while that appropriation will do some good, so small a sum will merely begin the work, leaving it in such a condition as to expose it to damage and decay before any other appropriation can be had that will nearly undo that which has been done.

This work, of course, is of great local importance, not only to the towns that happen to be situated along the canal, but it is of importance to the whole of Eastern North Carolina, as affording direct ocean communication for the Trent, the Neuse, the Pamlico, the Tar, and other rivers that enter into Pamlico Sound.

The Government, so far as the report shows, has only spent about $10,000 on this work, but it has made a canal sufficient for boats drawing 4 feet. Last year twelve hundred of these vessels passed through the canal, developing a commerce of $20 for every dollar the Government spent. And, notwithstanding that New Berne and Beaufort are connected by railroad transportation, this canal reduced the usual freight rates between these points 25 per cent. in one year.

Now, I know it is very difficult to secure an increase of an allowance made by this committee.

There are in the district that I happen to represent five different streams under improvement by the Government. One of those streams is 360 miles in length; another is 140 miles. They have an immense drainage area, and yet for all of those five streams the committee have allowed only about $35,000. In view of the importance of this work, both from a local and a national standpoint, as I have outlined, I do hope that the committee will agree to this increase, and if the committee does not, then I do hope that the House will take the matter in its own hands and will allow the small additional sum which I ask.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to assure my friend from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] that this water way in which he is so much interested has not been treated unfairly by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. The estimate for that water way was $36,000. We give it $15,000, which is about 47 per cent. of the estimate, and the make-up of our bill upon the estimates is upon the basis of about 47 per cent., so that the committee in this case have allowed the full amount in accordance with their general rule. This inland water way between New Berne and Beaufort was begun to be improved in 1882. The first appropriation was made in that year and was $5,000. Appropriations were made in 1884 and 1886, and there is one in the present bill. I call the attention of the gentleman from North Carolina to the fact that the bill of 1886 contained only $10,000 for this water way, while in the pending bill we allow $15,000. Now, with an appropriation in 1886 of only $10,000, the statements of the amounts on hand to the credit of various river and harbor improvements throughout the United States on the first of November, 1887, shows that, to the credit of the fund for the improvement of this particular inland water way, there was on that date $15,655. To that we have added $15,000 in the bill under consideration; which, as I have said, is 47 per cent. of the estimate of the Chief of Engineers, and $5,000 more than this water way received in the bill of 1886. For these reasons, Mr. Chairman, it must be apparent to the Committee of the Whole that this particular water way, at least, has been fairly treated by the committee.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand the gentleman to say that the estimate of the engineer is $35,000.

Mr. BLANCHARD. The estimate of the Chief of Engineers is $36,000.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then I have been misled by the report.

Mr. BLANCHARD. My friend probably looked at the estimate of the local engineer, but it is a fact that the Chief of Engineers revised the estimates of the local engineers for the different river and harbor improvements throughout the United States, and reduced them fully two-thirds.

Mr. SIMMONS. The estimate of the local engineer is $72,000 for the next year, and he advises that that all be expended at once.

Mr. BLANCHARD. But the chief reduced the amount to $36,000, and of that estimate we have given 47 per cent.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. SIMMONS, and it was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving harbor at Charleston, including Sullivan's Island, South Carolina: Continuing improvements, $350,000.

Mr. DIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, to come in on lines 205 and 206.

In lines 205 and 206 strike out "350" and insert "500."

Mr. DIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, I have no complaint to make of the gentlemen of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. On the contrary, I am indebted to them for a very attentive and courteous hearing in relation to this great work of national improvement, and I have also felt that they have realized the importance of the work in the appropriation which they have recommended.

But, Mr. Chairman, as a measure of economy, of pure business economy, as well as a measure of vast importance to the constituency which I have the honor to represent, this great work should be speedily completed. What is the history of this work? The distinguished engineer officer, General Gilmore, submitted a project for this improvement ten years ago, and it was initiated and entered upon with an appropriation of $200,000.

The work was to have been completed in the course of five years, but under the system of small appropriations which we have pursued it has already proceeded for ten years; and at the rate of appropriation which is granted in this bill it will take five years longer to complete it, the amount remaining to be appropriated under the estimate being one and one-half million dollars.

Now, I submit that this work should be completed in a shorter time, and that it will save the Government a large amount of money if it is completed speedily. I ask to have read at this time some extracts from the report of General Gilmore on this subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

I have no doubt that under the present plan the practicable low-water depth of 21 feet in the channel, equivalent to about 26 feet at mean high water, can be established—an increase of over 9 feet over the present depth of the bar channel. I am equally confident that a still greater increase in depth can be secured by adding to the length and height of the jetties.

It has been roughly estimated that, other things being equal, the tonnage of a harbor the depth of the entrance to which has been increased, compared with its average tonnage before the channel had been improved, is in the proportion of the cubes of these depths. According to this estimate, the marine business of Charleston, when the jetties shall be finished and the desired depths on the bar secured, should be three or four times greater than at the present time.

When the present shifting and comparatively shallow channel of entrance shall be replaced by a single one of ample depth and permanently fixed in position, affording the most direct access from the sea to the inner harbor, the one needed element will have been supplied which, in conjunction with the natural advantages of the geographical situation of the port, its deep, capacious, and sheltered anchorage, its wharves and its railroad connections with the West and Southwest, will undoubtedly assure the development of Charleston into a great commercial city.

APPROPRIATIONS.

For several years past I have in my annual reports and in other official communications called attention to the necessity of making more liberal appropriations for completing the improvement of the entrance to Charleston Harbor. In the nine years which have elapsed since the first appropriation was made funds have been provided at an average rate of $165,000 per year, or 5¼ per cent. of the amount of the estimated aggregate cost of the work.

The appropriation of $187,500 made in 1886 will, owing to the failure of the bill passed at the last session of Congress to become a law, have to serve for carrying on the work for a period of two years, permitting an annual expenditure of only about 3 per cent. of the total estimated cost of the work, a sum which might perhaps be deemed sufficient for annual repairs and maintenance of a work of this magnitude, but inadequate to an absurd degree for the successful prosecution of operations having in view the completion of the project within the present century.

In the half-finished condition of the jetties, deterioration during periods when operations are suspended for want of funds is, naturally, certain and rapid, and fully 40 per cent. of the amount last appropriated has been expended in work which would have been unnecessary if the funds required to secure a gradual but continuous development and consolidation of the structures had been more liberally and regularly provided.

It is obvious, therefore, that while the current appropriations are in amounts that only slightly exceed the requirements for current repairs, the final completion of the jetties will be indefinitely postponed, if, indeed, it is ever accomplished. The inevitable results of the policy which has obtained heretofore in the matter of supplying money for improvements of this character, in their increased cost, in their exposure while unfinished to serious damage, if not total destruction, and in the contingent losses which the delay in their completion causes the commercial interests for the benefit of which they were designed, have been suggested in previous reports and need not be again detailed. I desire, however, to repeat my former recommendation that annual appropriations of from $500,000 to $750,000 be made, with a view to speedily and economically completing this important improvement.

During the reading of the foregoing extract, when five minutes had expired,

Mr. HEMPHILL obtained the floor, and yielded his time to Mr. DIBBLE.

Mr. DIBBLE. Now, Mr. Chairman, upon that report the Chief of Engineers adopted as his recommendation the larger of those two amounts. I have adopted in this amendment the smaller. The Chief of Engineers recommended an appropriation of $750,000. He did not, as is generally the case, cut down the estimates of the local engineer, but he took the largest figure and based his recommendation upon that, showing his opinion of the importance of the work. I have asked of the House the minimum figure which General Gillmore said is absolutely necessary.

I realize, Mr. Chairman, the difficulties in connection with a bill of this kind, and nothing but my sense of responsibility and my conviction that the appropriation I ask is absolutely necessary has urged me to advocate the adoption of this amendment. This work and one other in this country are exceptional. This and the improvement at Galveston consist of work run out into the depth of the ocean, subject while going on to the action of wind and wave. General Gillmore in that report says that of the last $187,000, 40 per cent. was required to repair the damages which were caused by the deficiency in a previous appropriation and a consequent stoppage of the work.

Now, sir, this work has ceased again since last November. The funds are exhausted. Work has heretofore been interrupted in the same way. Will not the committee consent to give us the amount necessary to carry on this work continuously? It is one of the great national improvements, and owing to the exposure of the work to the action of storm and wave a large portion of the money appropriated—at least fifty or seventy-five thousand dollars—has to be held back, reserved out of the contract, for the purpose of preserving the work in the interim in case Congress should fail to make appropriation, in consequence of the failure of a river and harbor bill, or otherwise. Of the last appropriation $50,000 had to be reserved, and it was expended in securing the work during the time the appropriation for continuation was exhausted.

It is true economy to make the work on this improvement continuous. It is a work which Congress has entered upon—a work which all the engineers, as well as everybody else who has studied the subject, are satisfied will eventually be absolutely successful. It is beyond the region of doubt—it is now in the region of absolute certainty; and the question is, whether this work shall be completed in ten or fifteen years more under the system pursued in the past, or shall be finished within the next three years by an adequate appropriation each year. I hope my amendment will prevail.

Mr. BLANCHARD. In the river and harbor bill of 1886, the last one passed, there was appropriated for the harbor of Charleston $187,500. Of this amount I find there was on the 1st of November, 1887, $66,822 still on hand——

Mr. DIBBLE. I beg the gentleman to notice that all——

Mr. BLANCHARD. I grant that this or most of it is included in existing contracts; still, the fact remains that the $187,500 appropriated in 1886 had not all been expended on the 1st of November, 1887, and is not now all expended.

Mr. DIBBLE. I will ask my friend how much was available on that day?

Mr. BLANCHARD. Of the amount then standing to the credit of that fund, not included in the contract, there was $7,000 available.

Mr. DIBBLE. Yes; that is all.

Mr. BLANCHARD. If we gave Charleston Harbor in 1886—two years ago, or less than two years—$187,500, I submit that when in this bill we appropriate $350,000 it is quite as much, at least in view of our experience, as can be profitably expended there in the next year. For this reason I think the Committee of the Whole should not adopt this amendment.

Mr. DIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, the sum of $66,822 which the gentleman speaks of as unexpended on the 1st of November, 1887, was mainly included in contracts previously made, the work under which had already been done, so that the fact was simply that the money was not actually paid out to the parties who had done the work. All but $7,000 of the reserve fund of $50,000, of which I have spoken, had then been expended, and the balance has been expended since.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I so stated.

Mr. DIBBLE. I do not think, Mr. Chairman, that the argument of the gentleman is a good one. General Gillmore shows to the House that here is a work which was to have been finished in five years—which has now taken ten. He condemns the system of appropriations heretofore adopted. Here is an illustration: Of the $187,500 there had to be kept back as a reserve fund $50,000. Thus, money is lost which might have been saved if means had been at hand to proceed with the work. Are we to repeat our experience and consume ten years more in the completion of this work? I say that as a business proposition the amount of this appropriation should be increased. This is really an appropriation for two years' work. It has been two years since any appropriation has been made. I repeat that not only will Charleston be benefited, but as an economical measure this appropriation ought to be increased to at least $500,000.

The question recurred on Mr. DIBBLE's amendment; and on a division there were—ayes 43, noes 61.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving harbor at Georgetown, S. C.: Continuing improvement, $7,500.

Mr. DIBBLE. I move an amendment which does not increase the amount and to which I suppose there will be no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of line 206:
"Of which $5,000 may be expended on Mount Pleasant shore of inner harbor of Charleston, S. C."

Mr. BLANCHARD. There is no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Winyaw Bay, South Carolina: Continuing improvement, $100,000.

Mr. MCADOO. I move to strike out the last word.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of genuine river and harbor improvements; when constitutionally and honestly and practically expended I am their zealous advocate. I will take occasion for a few minutes to call attention to this item; and I will do so only to expose what I consider the weakness of these river and harbor bills, and the reason why some of us are compelled to oppose them.

In 1866 there was ordered in one of the provisions of a river and harbor bill a survey as to what could be done to get a greater depth of water in Winyaw Bay. It was thus it bowed itself, as it were, before the Congressional foot-lights.

In 1885 there was appropriated $18,000 for this work, and of that sum only about $2,000 have been expended, as shown by the reports. This leaves a balance of some $16,000 on hand.

Now, sir, I want to call the attention of the committee to this fact, that the engineer's estimate shows it will take $2,500,000 to make the improvement suggested here. This bill gives for these improvements the sum of $100,000. I want to impress upon the members of this House the fact that $100,000 so appropriated is just so much money taken out of the national Treasury and wasted; and that if they honestly intend to get a depth of 13 or 15 feet of water in Winyaw Harbor, they will have, according to the report of the engineers, to expend ultimately $2,500,000. You have reached the jumping-off place. If you want Winyaw Harbor improved, why not face the issue and appropriate $2,500,000, or reject the claim and give nothing. One hundred thousand means simply so much wasted—sunk in the bay.

Another fact: the wording of these reports as they come from the engineers seems to be ingenious. I think about $2,000 have been expended on this harbor, and the report begins by stating that prior to the appropriation of 1885 there were only so many feet of water on the bar, and that the $2,000 have been expended in the preliminary plans. Then, pray, what improvement has been made by the expenditure of that portion of the appropriation? If the depth of water has increased in that harbor it is not because of the fact that Congress appropriated in 1885 $18,000, but because of the fact that nature has been kind to the waters of Winyaw Harbor, and has deepened the channel.

This item is one of many which will be found throughout this bill, for they have always existed in prior bills, and I see no reason to doubt that they are also here. It is giving a driblet; it is wasting the public money for improvements which, if Congress honestly intends to make, will require millions of dollars, according to the statements and plans of those upon whom we are in the habit of depending for our estimates. So, I repeat that the expenditure of $100,000 this year in getting a greater depth of water in Winyaw Harbor will be that much money thrown away, if the engineer's statement is reliable, as we find it embodied in the annual reports, namely, that it will take $2,500,000 before the navigation of that harbor will be improved as contemplated by the plans submitted for its improvement.

Mr. WISE. That is for the completion of the improvement.

Mr. MCADOO. I have seen, Mr. Chairman, during my short career in Congress, the public money taken out in sums ranging from $5,000, $10,000, $20,000, $25,000, and $100,000, and devoted to the improvements of rivers and harbors, too little for anything valuable and too much for nothing, and then lost, because oftentimes there will be a failure of appropriation, and the next report of the Engineer's Office conveys to us the intelligence that the amount expended formerly in the improvement was wasted, as the works had been destroyed, the machinery decayed, and, through the lapse, the beginnings gone. This is a mere pebble in a great ocean. It will accomplish nothing but maps and reports.

The House is reminded that the time between making the appropriations was so long that the money theretofore spent in the work was absolutely wasted, and every dollar of the public money appropriated by Congress for carrying out the work of improvement was thrown away.

I would like, and think it due to the House, to have the Chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and the gentleman on this floor, I know not who, who represents the particular district in which this Winyaw Bay is situated, make an explanation why an appropriation of $100,000 of money is asked from the public Treasury of the United States for the improvement of this harbor.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Chairman, it is rather unfortunate for the gentleman from New Jersey that he should have selected out this particular appropriation for his attack upon and lecture to the committee and to Congress upon river and harbor improvements generally. This Winyaw Bay project is one the appropriation for which is fully justified by the commerce of the rivers of which Winyaw Bay is the only outlet to the ocean. If the gentleman had read on page 1080, at the bottom of the page, of the report submitted by the Board of Engineers under the heading of "Commercial statistics" he would have found:

This bay is the ocean entrance to Georgetown Harbor, South Carolina.

No work has yet been done except a survey to see if there is any way of advantageously expending the inadequate funds now on hand. The present commerce of this bay is that of the Waccamaw, Pee Dee, Black, and Sampit Rivers and Georgetown Harbor, a commerce of already $7,000,000 per year, carried by two hundred ocean vessels and two steamers, making bi-weekly trips to Charleston. At the ocean bar there is at present only 9 feet depth at ordinary low water. Otherwise navigation is practicable for boats of 12 feet draught. At present, however, vessels drawing no more than 10 to 12 feet are frequently detained for several days awaiting a flush high water to take them over the bar; and however great the distress in which a vessel may be while outside the harbor, no tug drawing over 7 or 8 feet can go to her assistance during low water.

A commerce that aggregates from one point two hundred ocean vessels and two steam-ships, and which accommodates $7,000,000 of commerce annually, would certainly seem to be a suitable subject for consideration in a river and harbor bill.

Mr. MCADOO. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him? I find in part 1 of the engineer's report they refer to an appendix, "M 15," as giving the report of the local engineer in reference to this improvement. On looking over to that part of the work, that appendix "M 15," I find that the report of the local engineer is omitted. It refers to page 1078 as giving further information about the harbor; but I can not find a word about it. I understand the gentleman from Louisiana is reading in reference to the Ashley River.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I am reading from the report of the Chief Engineer, to be found on pages 1079, 1080, and 1081, of part 2 of the Engineer's Report for 1887, in which he says:

Already Winyaw Bay is the outlet to $7,000,000 of annual commerce of the Sampit, Black, Pee Dee, and Waccamaw Rivers. More than this, it is now connected by a 7-mile canal to the Santee River, so that it will soon be the shortest and most accessible outlet to $5,000,000 of annual commerce which will come down the Congaree, Wateree, and Santee Rivers as soon as the railroad bridges over these rivers are properly furnished with draw-spans. These river basins at present raise over 400,000 bales ($16,000,000) of cotton per year. These rivers are now navigable over 800 miles by steamers and over 1,000 miles by pole boats. The amount of water now flowing in and out of Winyaw Bay at mid-tide is about 220,000 cubic feet per minute, sufficient to keep open a passage-way of 4,000 feet width and 21 feet average depth if provided with proper training-walls or dikes. All opinions of the Government engineers in charge of this work so far are to the effect that the bar is well worthy of improvement, and that it can be easily improved provided the necessary funds are voted in adequately large annual appropriations. An immediate appropriation of $800,000, properly spent, would undoubtedly develop at once an additional commerce of $8,000,000 per year.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in order to deepen the bar at the entrance of Winyaw Bay to the ocean, we make this appropriation of $100,000 out of an estimate of $300,000. And yet my friend from New Jersey passes a severe criticism upon the committee, notwithstanding the fact that $7,000,000 value of commerce is to be benefited by the appropriation.

Mr. MCADOO. I owe it to the able and fair chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors to say that I was unfortunately reading from the report of last year. I had not in my hand at the time I made my remarks the report of the present year.

I do not feel at liberty to dispute the statement made by the local engineer as to the importance of the commerce of this bay. But I hold to my position that if it will take $2,500,000 to give a depth of water that will meet the wants of the commerce of this important harbor $100,000 is not enough, and if this is a legitimate public work, and this appropriation is not sufficient for the purpose, then it is too much.

The amendment offered by Mr. MCADOO was not agreed to.

The Clerk read lines 211 and 212, as follows:

Improving harbor at Brunswick, Ga.: Continuing improvement, $35,000.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I had hoped that this river and harbor bill would be reported in such a condition that I could support it. That was my desire. I believe in improving the great water ways of the country. I believe it to be a safeguard for the people against the undue charges that are often made by the railroads. But there must be a reasonable rule adopted. If we are going to put through a river and harbor bill it seems to me that rule must aim at the improvement of the great water ways and not of the trivial water ways. And this bill—I say it in all kindness to the committee—for I know the embarrassments they are under this bill steps entirely beyond the rule which ought to obtain and brings in a vast amount of appropriations that will baffle the knowledge of the best equipped man here in the geography of this country.

We have tested the pulse of the people in regard to river and harbor bills. In the Forty-seventh Congress there was appropriated $18,743,875; this bill appropriates $19,494,783.13 as brought in from the committee. It is possibly in the memory of many gentlemen on this floor what the verdict of the people was in respect to the river and harbor bill which passed the Forty-seventh Congress, although less than this in amount. It was made the slogan of battle through the campaign of 1882. And even the Democracy, who joined in putting through that legislation, nailed to the masthead and painted upon their banners: "Down with the Republican party because it passed this enormous appropriation bill of $18,000,000."

And I am frank to say that the verdict of the people at the polls in that campaign was against the appropriation of so large a sum. With that recent piece of history in our memory, I for one do not purpose to vote for a bill that goes beyond the bill which was condemned by the people through the great popular verdict in 1882. Our Democratic brethren then voting side by side with the Republicans, the bill having two to one in its favor, were swift to use it as an instrument against us in the great struggle referred to.

Now, we are asked to give our approval to a bill vastly more in amount, disregarding the rule that I have alluded to with a recklessness not even found in the bill of 1882; and I caution the House to act upon a policy that will compel the committee of the House, I should say compel the House itself, to recognize that the people are willing to be liberal to a bill which will provide for the great water thoroughfares, but which will not dump millions into small inlets, rivers, and creeks that we can not find upon the map, and never heard of before.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Just one word more.

Mr. GEAR was recognized, and yielded his time to Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I am not censuring the committee about this. I know how hard it is for them to resist when we are all around clamoring for our respective localities. And I recognize also, kindly, the courtesy of the committee in giving notice to all that we might go and be heard. I thought that was a proper thing for them to do with regard to so important a bill. I recognize that the purpose was a kind and proper one. But it is the pressure that comes from all of us interested in our districts that forced the condition which now confronts us with this particular bill.

I say I regret that I can not give my approval, and I take this method of stating most kindly to the House the reasons which will govern me in recording my vote against the bill, as I feel it to be my duty to do.

I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read lines 216 and 217, as follows:

Improving harbor at Savannah, Ga.: Continuing improvement, $50,000.

Mr. DOUGHERTY. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

Improving harbor at St. Augustine, Fla., $35,000.

Mr. DOUGHERTY. I am not offering that amendment to consume the time of the committee; and in speaking to the amendment I do not deem it necessary to go into any commercial statistics at all, because those commercial statistics are all given in the letter of the Secretary of War, Executive Document No. 87.

The circumstances which make it necessary for this amendment to be offered at this stage of the bill are exceedingly peculiar. It is owing to the fact that this report is printed in such a manner that neither the chairman of the committee nor the clerk of the committee nor several members who with myself earnestly searched for this report, could find it at all.

An examination of the document will show that it is a report covering some thirty-six pages. Thirty-two of those thirty-six pages relate to the improvement of the harbor at St. Augustine, Fla. But nowhere in the paging or in the title page does the name of St. Augustine appear except in very small type, so that in looking through the great mass of executive documents any gentleman, no matter how much he might be interested, would pass this letter of the Secretary over as not relating to this harbor of St. Augustine, but as relating to the harbor of Punta Rassa, in the southwest portion of the State.

I do not know but I am justified in making the statement that if the committee had had this report before them they would have put the item in the bill which is covered by the amendment, $35,000.

It is proper for me further to state to the committee that it was altogether by accident that this document was discovered, and it was only found after I had written and visited both the Department of War and the Department of the Treasury.

That is my reason for offering this amendment, and I do not believe it will be opposed by the committee.

Mr. SPRINGER. What is the estimate?

Mr. DOUGHERTY. The estimate is some $1,400,000; but I am in possession of a letter from the engineer in charge which says that the shore end of the proposed jetties can be built for the amount of money I have named in the amendment.

Mr. SPRINGER. What is the amount?

Mr. DOUGHERTY. Thirty-five thousand dollars.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Chairman, in the river and harbor bill for 1886 Congress incorporated an order for a survey of St. Augustine Harbor for a deep-sea channel on the outer bar. In accordance with that direction of Congress the Secretary of War caused a survey to be made, but it was not printed in the report of 1887 which was submitted to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and it only came before the committee in a list of new projects recommended by the Chief of Engineers. When the Committee on Rivers and Harbors came to take up the new projects they made appropriations for several, but when they came to those pertaining to the State of Florida somehow or other they were unable to find the one pertaining to St. Augustine. A delegation of citizens of that city had appeared before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and had presented the needs of the harbor for improvement, and the committee became satisfied that it was a meritorious project which should be appropriated for; but, as stated by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. DOUGHERTY], we could not find the report anywhere. It was not in the Engineer's Report and it could not be found among the public documents in the document-room. We therefore could not consider it for want of data. We had the statement of the Chief of Engineers that he had sent a report to Congress, but where that report was we could not ascertain. However, after we had reported the bill the gentleman from Florida [Mr. DOUGHERTY], who represents that district, by his own diligence and by calling to his aid the office of the Chief of Engineers, succeeded in finding the report under another heading. But since the report was found the Committee on Rivers and Harbors has never sat in judgment upon the project.

The report shows that the work is one of merit, and I have no doubt that if we had had it before us before we reported the bill we would have incorporated an appropriation for that harbor. I submit this statement of facts to the Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving harbor at Mobile, Ala.: Continuing improvement on enlarged project for securing a channel 23 feet deep and 280 feet wide, $250,000.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Chairman, at this point I wish to call attention to a feature of this bill which must strike the most casual observer, that is, the easy way in which the compilers of this remarkable document have slid along from small appropriations of $2,500, $3,700, $5,000, and a reluctant $10,000, up to such figures as we find on page 10 of the bill. I take them as they come: $7,500, $100,000, $35,000 $112,500, $90,000, $20,000, $7,500, $35,000, $20,000, $250,000.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not rise to say that all of these appropriations are not justifiable. I make no complaint about these particular items, but I do say that there is some system of mathematics or some process of distribution employed by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors which is beyond my understanding, and by the operation of which they are led to give, for instance, an appropriation of $250,000 to improve the harbor of Mobile, while my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. COGSWELL] insists that my people ought to be exceedingly grateful that they have given us $10,000 for the entire Penobscot River, with half a dozen ports situate upon it doing as much business as is done at Mobile. For instance, and I do not propose to go into detail, I find that for the year 1887 the entire amount of duties on imports collected at Mobile was $19,042.32, while the customs collections the same year at the single port of Bangor, on the Penobscot, were over $87,000.

Now, there are circumstances under which it might be argued that these figures would not prove that money might not properly be expended at Mobile while none was expended at Bangor, because the one harbor might be in excellent condition while the other might need improvement; but the answer in this case is that the United States Engineer's Report shows that improvements are in progress at both these points. The recommendations are much more liberal, I grant you, for the port in Alabama than for the one in Maine, and I think you will find a similar liberality to the South all through these engineers' reports; but still there is this enormous, and, to my mind, unaccounted for, discrepancy between an appropriation of $250,000 for Mobile and an appropriation of $10,000 for the entire Penobscot River, with its 60 miles of navigable water and the great bay into which many of the so-called harbors of this bill might be dropped and lost. For those great navigable waters we are grudgingly granted $10,000, an amount which the engineers have stated to me time after time and which I, in turn, have stated to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, is not sufficient to incite that competition among contractors which will enable the Government to get the work done at an economical rate.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say again that I have not risen to oppose this Mobile appropriation. I want to see the harbor of Mobile improved and I do not grudge a quarter of a million of dollars, if necessary, to do it; I am ready to vote adequate appropriation for that harbor; but I do say again that I can not understand and do not appreciate the system of distribution which is exhibited here by the figures to which I have called attention.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, the appropriation for Mobile is perfectly consistent with all the others in the bill; that is, it is about 50 per cent. of the amount recommended by the engineers. The engineers give the reasons why this improvement ought to be made, and they are urgent. One is that the commerce of the port is rapidly increasing and can not be accommodated by the present depth of water, which is only 17 feet, while larger vessels are coming to that port every year.

He goes on to say that the harbor of Mobile is destined in the near future to be an important one to the United States Government, from the fact that it is the only point on the Gulf at which cheap coal and iron can be obtained.

Mobile, Mr. Chairman, is the only seaport in America to which coal can be transported by tide-water navigation. It is true that coal is brought 2,000 miles, from Pittsburgh and the adjacent region, to New Orleans, but is then 110 miles from the Gulf. The coal-fields of Alabama, 2,600 feet in depth, and embracing 5,500 square miles, are only 250 miles from the seaboard, with which they are connected by five navigable rivers, some of them over 500 miles in length, constituting a part of a river system which, with the exception of the Mississippi system, is the finest on this continent.

We want to bring this coal to Mobile. We want the Gulf squadrons to get the benefit of it. We want to export it to South America and Central America. Mobile is only 1,300 miles from Aspinwall. England, which now sends coal to Aspinwall, is 5,300 miles distant. We can make three trips with cargoes of coal from Mobile to Aspinwall while a ship is going from England to Aspinwall.

I do not see why the gentleman from Maine should undertake to attack this appropriation for Mobile; for he said a few moments ago that whenever a seaport or harbor could be found which deserved a liberal appropriation he would gladly vote for it. I think this is such a case.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. JONES] certainly misunderstood me if he supposed I was "attacking" this appropriation. On the contrary, as I tried to state distinctly, I am very glad to see appropriations made where there is a harbor or a river legitimately entitled to improvement. I have some knowledge of Mobile Harbor and the Alabama River. I have navigated them from Sand Island Channel to Montgomery. Mobile was once one of our greatest commercial seaports. I trust it may become so again; and certainly I shall be glad to do my part in bringing about that result.

I selected this particular appropriation, not for the purpose of antagonizing it, but to express my regret that my friend from Alabama, while looking after the interests of his own locality so efficiently as a member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, did not allow his eye to glance along the Northeastern seaboard, and did not use his endeavors to secure for us something a little more reasonable than the small pittance which has been granted.

Mr. JONES. Your State gets 80 per cent. of the estimates.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I beg the gentleman's pardon. If he will look at the figures he will find that the Chief of Engineers has applied his reducing process very much more severely to my section of country than to some others. The appropriations recommended by the men who have carried on these improvements—the local engineers in charge of the work—aggregated $575,000 for the coast of my State. The committee propose to appropriate $170,000—about one-third of what the local engineers recommended.

Improving harbor at Biloxi Bay, Miss.: Continuing improvement, $18,500.

Mr. CRAIN. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 236 insert the following:
"Improving Pass Caballo, Texas: Continuing improvement, $50,000."

Mr. CRAIN. Mr. Chairman, this is just one-fourth of what the local engineer recommends.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Chairman, on behalf of the committee I feel called upon to oppose the adoption of this amendment. The committee took into consideration—I might say into painful consideration—Pass Caballo Harbor; and in spite of our willingness to oblige my amiable friend from Texas [Mr. CRAIN], we found ourselves unable to make any recommendation for this harbor. The report (pages 1429 and 1430) which I hold in my hand does not justify an appropriation for this horbor; and I therefore hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. CRAIN. Mr. Chairman, I feel exceedingly grateful to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors for the personal consideration which they gave to the "gentleman from Texas," but I was under the impression that in considering these questions the commercial importance of the place was regarded, not the personal feelings of the individual who happened to represent that place.

Mr. KERR. There is where you made a great mistake. [Laughter.]

Mr. CRAIN. I may, and doubtless have, made a great mistake in that particular; because if the committee had regarded my personal feelings in this matter they certainly would have recommended an appropriation for Pass Caballo. I really do not believe that the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors knows where Pass Caballo is. [Laughter.] And I will read for his information and the information of the committee the opinion which has been pronounced by one of the most distinguished engineers that America has produced, that it is the most susceptible of improvement of any harbor on the Gulf coast. I refer to General Joseph E. Johnston.

The engineer of the improvements on the coast of Texas differs very materially in his representation of the necessity for the continuation of this improvement from the gentleman who has charge of this bill in this House. He recommends an appropriation of $200,000, and he uses this language on the very page of the report to which the gentleman who is chairman of the committee refers:

In the capacity of a harbor of refuge it will be a benefit to all of the coast trade of Texas.

And in connection with this improvement I will take the liberty of appropriating the remarks made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SAWYER] when he stood before the House in opposition to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] in behalf of the appropriation recommended by the committee, I believe, for Oak Orchard.

While it is true, Mr. Chairman, that some years ago Indianola, which was the principal seaport on Matagorda Bay, was destroyed, it is equally true that to-day Port Lavaca, upon the Lavaca Bay, is the county seat of Calhoun County, and is one of the termini of the Southern Pacific Railroad, which connects the East with the West.

The report of the deputy collector, dated July 11, 1887, shows that the value of the cargoes which entered for the year ending June 30, 1887, at Port Lavaca was nearly a half million of dollars. I will ask the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors if it is not true he has given to places, and when I say "he" I mean the committee—given appropriations of a quarter of a million of dollars to places which have not had five boats of 50 tons enter them for ten years.

In view of the fact that I have not made a very long speech in support of this amendment I hope the committee will adopt it.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I am obliged to my friend from Texas for the statement that perhaps the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors did not know where Pass Cavallo was.

Texas has a long seacoast, some 800 miles in length; and among the many inlets indenting that long coast line if I failed to find any town or harbor by the name of Pass Cavallo, I will be excused when I tell the committee there is no town there. [Laughter.]

Mr. CRAIN. Will the gentleman pardon an interruption?

Mr. BLANCHARD. No, not just now. Now, Mr. Chairman, my idea of a harbor is you must not only have water which will permit the entrance of vessels from the ocean and passage out to the ocean, but there must be something there in the way of people and commerce to be benefited. That is what I take a harbor to be.

Now, in that place there is no harbor of Pass Cavallo. I will read from the report:

The town of Indianola, at which the custom-house was formerly located, the only town of any importance on Matagorda Bay, has been abandoned. It suffered so severely during the storm of 1875, and again during that of last August, that the inhabitants have concluded to seek a safer location. The custom-house has been removed to Eagle Pass, on the Rio Grande. No steamer has entered Matagorda Bay during the year. Small coasting schooners, drawing 5 feet or less, still visit Port Lavaca, upon Lavaca Bay, which communicates by shoal water with Matagorda Bay on the north.

It is said there is no commerce there to be benefited; no steamer for years has entered that bay, and the Committee on Rivers and Harbors were not apprised of anything before us in the way of a report that any harbor of refuge was needed on that portion of the Texas coast.

For these reasons, I submit, the committee were justified in not appropriating for the improvement of the harbor of Pass Cavallo, and especially since it will require the enormous sum of $1,360,000 to complete the project there to benefit which there is no town and no commerce.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CRAIN. Mr. Chairman, I regret very much to be compelled to dispute the statement of the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, but there is a town there. There is a county seat there. There never has been a collection district there, notwithstanding the statement of the local engineer. There is not now a collection district there, for there never was one. The town of Indianola was unfortunately destroyed in 1875, but the county seat of the county now is the town of Port Lavaca, which is 16 miles inland, and, as shown by the report to which the chairman refers, there was entered there last year $2,500,000 worth of merchandise. Yet the gentleman says there is no town there.

I say that this bill contains appropriations of a quarter of a million dollars for places into which not five vessels have entered for a hundred years.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I wish to state that the gentleman from Texas is not disputing any statement made by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. CRAIN. I do not dispute it offensively, you understand.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I know that. The gentleman is disputing the statement of the engineer who wrote the report.

Mr. CRAIN. That was what I stated.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Now, the engineer's report said there was no town there.

Mr. CRAIN. He refers to three years ago, 1885.

Mr. BLANCHARD. This town is 16 miles inland, and of the few vessels that get to Port Lavaca the greatest draught amongst them is only 5½ feet. There is practically no commerce to be benefited there by the appropriation the gentleman suggests; practically none whatever. As a harbor of refuge there is not a line in favor of it or suggesting that one is needed.

Mr. CRAIN. Will the gentleman pardon an interruption there? Please look on page 1430.

Mr. BLANCHARD. He says:

In its former capacity—

Referring to Pass Cavallo as a harbor of refuge—

it will be of benefit to all of the coasting trade of Texas.

But there are no statistics furnished of its trade, and nothing to justify Congress in expending the one million three hundred and odd thousand dollars required to complete the existing project.

Now, we would like to have continued this improvement, but we were not justified by the facts before us, and therefore omitted it after taking it more than twice under consideration. [Cries of "Vote!"]

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. CRAIN, it was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Aransas Pass and Bay up to Rockport and Corpus Christi, Tex.: Continuing improvement, $100,000.

Mr. CRAIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 238 and 239 strike out "$100,000" and insert "$200,000."

Mr. CRAIN. That is the amount recommended by the Chief of Engineers; and I trust that the chairman of the committee will not oppose that amendment.

Mr. STEWART, of Texas. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors it is proper that I should say a word in this connection. I have no particular objection to increasing the amount of the appropriation to the extent of the amendment offered by my colleague; but I think it due in justice to myself that I should say something in regard to the matter.

As has been stated by one of my colleagues on the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, the estimates of the officials in charge of the different works in the United States aggregated a total of $160,000,000. The Chief of Engineers in submitting his estimate saw proper to cut these amounts down to about $40,000,000, and the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, knowing that it was impracticable to pass a bill carrying $40,000,000 for river and harbor improvements, reduced the estimates of the Chief of Engineers to the amount embodied by the present bill. In that connection I desire to say that for Texas the rule was adopted, and not only for Texas, but here let me say, as I think of it now, that in considering these appropriations we did not regard States or State lines, but supposed that all the ports of the United States belonged to the General Government, and we have appropriated for the items embodied in the bill without regard to State lines.

We found it necessary to adopt some rule to guide us, and we fixed what can not be called an iron-clad rule, but one which we adhered to as nearly as possible in making the appropriations, and we gave, as gentlemen have discovered, from 40 to 50 per cent. of the amounts reported.

For Aransas Pass the original estimates submitted (and I speak from recollection, though I believe I have the estimate before me), as stated by the engineer, which could be profitably expended during the fiscal year was $1,500,000. The Chief Engineer cut that estimate down to $200,000; and we gave 50 per cent. of the amount, which I thought was fair and in accordance with the appropriations that we made for other places, not only in Texas, but generally throughout the Union.

But, as I stated before, I have only said this much because I was a member of the committee, and did not want to be put in the position of not having taken care of the interests of the State of Texas confided to me; and not only of Texas, but of the other States of the Union under this bill. If, however, the House sees proper to increase the amount of the appropriation, I am perfectly willing it shall do so; but I believe at the same time that the appropriations here made are just, and in accordance with the appropriations made for other places throughout the Union. [Applause.]

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to; and Mr. RICHARDSON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. MCMILLIN reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. Mr. DAWES presented a petition of the trustees of the public schools of the District of Columbia, praying for the passage of Senate bill 1996, to prohibit selling, giving, or furnishing tobacco in any of its forms to minors under sixteen years of age in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CHACE. I present a petition which is signed by the names of 257 physicians in the District of Columbia, including among the names all or nearly all of the most prominent physicians in the District. The petition prays for the passage of the bill (S. 1996) to prohibit selling, giving, or furnishing cigarettes or tobacco in any of its forms to minors under sixteen years of age in the District of Columbia. I wish that the petition, with its signatures, might take some other course than the ordinary course of lying on the table. It refers more especially to the sale of cigarettes. These men have investigated the subject with a great deal of care, and have become impressed with the belief that it is a very great and serious evil.

I do not like to make the request, but I will suggest that the petition with the signatures be printed in the RECORD. I think it is a proper thing to be done.

Mr. STEWART. I think that the petition relates to a very grave evil. I believe cigarettes are destroying more youth than any other one thing that is affecting the prosperty of the country. The use of cigarettes by boys is most injurious, and it is destroying the rising generation in many of our large cities.

Mr. CHACE. I am glad to hear the Senator say that.

Mr. PLUMB. I should like to ask the Senator from Rhode Island what is his purpose in having the petition printed in the RECORD? Is it for the purpose of giving greater publicity to it?

Mr. HARRIS. I object to the printing of the petition in the RECORD.

Mr. CHACE. Then I move that it be printed as a document.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. HARRIS. I object to that.

Mr. CHACE. The use of cigarettes is undermining the health of the whole community by destroying the physical constitutions of the youth of this country.

Mr. HARRIS. Is the question debatable, Mr. President?

Mr. CHACE. It is a very serious evil, indeed, and it is a matter not to be treated as trivial in any of its effects.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be received and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia. The Chair understands that objection is made to the printing of the petition as a document, and the question will be submitted to the Senate, shall the petition be printed as a document? [Putting the question.] The ayes appear to have it.

Mr. HARRIS. I call for a division.

The question being put, the ayes were 27——

Mr. HARRIS. I do not ask for a further count.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is agreed to, and the order to print the petition as a document will be made.

Mr. STEWART. In order to complete the record, as the petition presented by the Senator from Rhode Island is to be printed, I present a petition of pastors of the churches and officers of the schools on the same subject; which I should like to have printed with it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition presented by the Senator from Nevada will be printed in connection with the petition of the Senator from Rhode Island, if there be no objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly we ought not to print all this multitude of papers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands it to be one petition, with numerous signatures.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I would not print the names. It never has been done. Let a memorandum be made simply of the signatures. With that modification I have no objection.

Mr. STEWART. I want to have the whole petition printed. The matter is well stated in it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition presented by the Senator from Rhode Island was voluminous, containing several hundred names of leading physicians. Under the statement of the Senator from Ohio, if there is no objection, the body of the petition presented by the Senator from Nevada will be printed only, with the statement of the number of signatures.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is all right.

Mr. STEWART. And the official character of those who signed the petition.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly; a memorandum of the signatures.

Mr. STEWART. A memorandum showing who the petitioners are.

Mr. DAWES. I understood the Senator from Rhode Island to desire the petition which he presented to be printed that the testimony of those who had signed it might have its due weight with this community, and if their names are left out the whole purpose of printing the petition would be lost. I presented a petition this morning for the same purpose. I did not ask to have it printed, because I suppose they are all in one form. The petition presented by the Senator from Rhode Island was signed by leading physicians whose reputation is such that they are entitled to a great deal of weight in this community. I supposed it was for that reason that the Senator desired his petition to be printed, and if the names are left off the force of his petition will be lost entirely. I call his attention to the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio that the petition be printed without the names.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that the petitions are from three sources, 86 pastors of churches having signed one, 257 physicians another, and 524 superintendents, officers, and teachers of public schools another. They are identical in language, and differ only in the signatures. The Chair will await the order of the Senate about their printing.

Mr. DAWES. It seems to me that the petition with the names of the physicians upon it should be printed, and that there would be no particular advantage in having the others printed.

Mr. STEWART. A memorandum of the others will be sufficient.

Mr. CHACE. Yes; a memorandum reciting the fact that such petitions, with so many names signed to them, were presented.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the petition and signatures of the petition of physicians will be printed at length and the others will be noted by memorandum.

Mr. CHACE. I suggest that the memorandum state the character of the parties and the number of signatures.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS presented a petition of ex-Union soldiers and sailors, citizens of Vermont, praying for the passage of the per diem rated service-pension bill; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WALTHALL. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 73) relating to the disposal of public lands in Mississippi, to report it with an amendment, and to ask unanimous consent that it may be immediately considered.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment reported from the Committee on Public Lands will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 3 change the word "State" to "States;" and in line 4, after the word "Mississippi," insert "and Alabama;" so as to make the joint resolution read:

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. Was not the joint resolution to be amended so as to include also the State of Arkansas?

Mr. CALL. Senate bill 1431 has just come from the other House with a formal amendment which is not a material one. I ask unanimous consent that it may be taken up for consideration, and the amendment of the House of Representatives concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives on the bill (S. 1431) making an appropriation for the establishment of a light or lights and other aids to navigation to guide into Charlotte Harbor, Florida. The amendment of the House of Representatives will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That a light or lights and other aids to navigation to guide into Charlotte Harbor, Florida, be established, at a cost not to exceed $35,000.

Amend the title to read: "An act for establishing a light or lights and other aids to navigation to guide into Charlotte Harbor, Florida."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida moves that the Senate concur in the amendments made by the House of Representatives.

Mr. HARRIS. What is the difference between that substitute and the bill as it passed the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The original bill as passed by the Senate will be read.

Mr. CALL. I will state the difference. The other House simply struck out the appropriating clause and left the appropriation to be made in the sundry civil bill, that being the policy of that body.

Mr. HARRIS. Is that the only difference between the two measures?

Mr. CALL. It is the only difference.

The amendments were concurred in.

FORFEITURE OF UNEARNED RAILROAD LANDS.

Mr. PLUMB. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 1430) to forfeit certain lands heretofore granted for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

BOOK AND POOL MAKING.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Will the Senator from Kansas, before proceeding with the consideration of the land bill, yield to me to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which I am sure will not require a moment's time and which will occasion no debate? I refer to the bill (H. R. 4964) to prevent any person or persons in the cities of Washington and Georgetown from making books and pools on the results of trotting or running races or boat races. I will state that the bill has passed the House of Representatives, it has been reported unanimously by the Committee on the District of Columbia of the Senate, and, as the Senate knows, there is reason why it should be considered now if it is to become operative before the inauguration of the meeting at the race-course which begins on Thursday of this week.

Mr. PLUMB. If the bill will not consume any considerable length of time I will yield.

Mr. BLACKBURN. If it provokes any debate I will withdraw it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the pending order be informally laid aside for the consideration of the bill indicated by him.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 4964) to prevent any person or persons in the cities of Washington and Georgetown from making books and pools on the result of trotting or running races or boat races.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FORFEITURE OF UNEARNED RAILROAD LANDS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1430) to forfeit certain lands heretofore granted for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. PALMER to the amendment of Mr. STOCKBRIDGE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment and the amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out section 4 of the bill and to insert in lieu thereof:

That in all cases when any of the lands forfeited by the first section of this act, or when any lands relinquished to, or for any cause resumed by, the United States from grants for railroad purposes, have heretofore been disposed of by the proper officers of the United States, by sales, entries, locations, or State selections, under color of the public-land laws, and where the consideration received therefor is still retained by the Government, the right and title of all persons holding or claiming under such disposals shall be, and is hereby, confirmed: Provided, That there were no pre-emption or homestead settlers, bona fide, residing thereon on January 1, 1888.

It is proposed to amend this amendment by inserting after the word "sales," in line 5, the word "or;" and after the word "entries," in the same line, striking out the words "locations or State selections" and inserting the words "by cash, warrants, or scrip."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment first read was proposed by the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. STOCKBRIDGE]. His colleague [Mr. PALMER] proposes to amend the amendment. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. STOCKBRIDGE. The pending amendment was presented by me, not expecting that it would lead to the extended debate which has occurred upon it; and as the matter contained in the amendment is rather complicated and difficult to arrive at a correct understanding of on the floor, it never having been referred to a committee, I desire, with the consent of my colleague [Mr. PALMER], who has proposed an amendment to my amendment, to withdraw the proposition and not encumber the present bill with the question involved. I ask leave, therefore, to withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan asks leave to withdraw the amendment proposed by him to the pending bill. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to make an inquiry in reference to that. Suppose this amendment to be withdrawn, how does the bill then affect these conflicting rights of parties who are claiming lands under the grant to the State of Michigan?

Mr. PLUMB. It does not affect that matter at all, but leaves it, as far as their rights with respect to each other are concerned, precisely as they are now.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, this amendment, which was suggested by the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. STOCKBRIDGE], and which he now proposes to withdraw, affects, as I understand, very seriously indeed the rights of some citizens of Massachusetts claiming under the State selections made in behalf of the canal which has been referred to. Those citizens paid the consideration, amounting to more than a million of dollars, under the original land grant, and their rights or the rights of persons claiming under them, actual purchasers, will be very seriously affected by this bill. I understand that in one case some persons have been sent in under an arrangement prohibited by the United States law as to pre-emption to actually pre-empt the spot where the grave-yard and where the church of a village are located.

What will be the precise effect of the bill if the proposed section is entirely withdrawn I am not able to determine without a full examination, and I should like very much to have the Senator in charge of the bill consent that at least there shall be no final vote on the measure until I can have time to consider it.

Mr. PLUMB. There will not be a vote on the bill to-day.

Mr. HOAR. Very well.

Mr. PLUMB. The short time between now and 2 o'clock will prevent a vote to-day.

Mr. HOAR. I can make my statement much more condensed to-morrow than to-day, after time for examination.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I rise for the purpose of appealing to the Senator from Kansas to let this bill go over until to-morrow. The reason I have for so doing I will state.

I was unexpectedly called away from the city on Thursday by reason of illness in my family, and I did not know that this bill was to be considered to-day. Since then I have had many letters from constituents of mine who are interested in matters appertaining to the amendments now pending before the Senate; and as I have just returned this morning I have been unable to investigate the matter and give it that attention to which I think it is entitled from me. I desire to investigate the amendments that have been offered by the Senators from Michigan, and as I have not the data before me I ask the courtesy of the Senate and of the Senator from Kansas that the bill lie over informally without losing its place until to-morrow morning that I may acquaint myself with some of the facts.

Mr. PLUMB. I have already stated to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] that the bill can not be disposed of to-day.

Mr. MCPHERSON. But the question now is on the amendments, which, I think, are the essence of the matter.

Mr. PLUMB. The amendment to which the Senator refers is already withdrawn, and the Senator will have ample opportunity to speak tomorrow it he desires. There are other amendments to be acted on. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] has risen to take the floor now for the purpose of making extended remarks on the subject, and all the Senator desires to accomplish by what he has stated will be entirely met by allowing us to go on with the bill.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I was not aware that the Senator from Nevada desired to speak.

Mr. HOAR. Allow me to make a suggestion. The Senator from Kansas says there will be no vote taken on the bill in the Senate to-day. The amendments adopted in committee will have to be readopted in the Senate.

Mr. PLUMB. I do not expect that any final vote will be taken to-day at all, even on an amendment.

Mr. HOAR. Very well.

Mr. PLUMB. There is enough pending in the shape of amendments to occupy the time, independent of the remarks of the Senator from Nevada, and I have given that assurance this morning to the Senator from New Jersey because of his convenience, and I suppose it is entirely satisfactory.

Mr. PALMER. I agree with my colleague that it is wise to withdraw this amendment, for I think it will lead to more discussion than all else in the bill. I do not think it has any business on the bill any way. I think it is an independent matter; and leaving it out affects no interest injuriously.

In regard to the canal selections, they have one obstacle removed to their confirmation; but no one is damnified by the withdrawal of the amendment.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator from Michigan is familiar with the matters which interest my colleague and myself, and I tried to get an explanation out of him on Thursday; and I should like to have him look at the first section of the bill, and then see if the facts I state are correct.

There is certain land in Michigan that was granted by the United States to the railroad company which has been named, which has never been earned by the railroad company, because the railroad went somewhere else. Michigan, supposing she had obtained the right from the United States to assign lands elsewhere, assigned those lands to the canal company, and the canal company has sold them to bona fide purchasers. Now, I understand that they stand on the record as unearned lands granted to a railroad company, although Michigan, assuming that she had the right, has made other disposition of them, and has disposed of them so that they are in the hands of innocent purchasers for a valuable consideration.

The first section of the bill proposes to forfeit to the United States all unearned lands granted for railroads. Why take these lands out of these purchasers, for valuable consideration in good faith, from Michigan and forfeit them because they stand included in the description of "unearned railroad grants?" I should like to have the Senator's attention called to that, because the effect of it, as I understand it, would be to forfeit to the United States as well the title claimed by these bona fide purchasers as also the claim of the settlers of whom he spoke on Thursday. The force of this first section, as I understand, would forfeit to the United States everybody's rights because, in point of fact, there is a legal defect both in the rights of these bona fide purchasers and in the homesteaders, and therefore the lands stand as the unearned lands of a railroad grant, and will go back to the United States by the force of the first section of the bill, as I understand it. So it will operate as well upon the constituents of the Senator from Michigan, who spoke on Thursday in their behalf, as upon my constituents, who hold their title as bona fide purchasers from the State of Michigan.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, inasmuch as this will take some time——

Mr. PALMER. It will take me but little time, and I would like to answer the question of the Senator from Massachusetts at once.

Mr. STEWART. Very well.

Mr. PALMER. I do not understand that we can by any legislation here interfere with vested rights. If the canal company has got rights there, by this bill we could not interfere with them unless it was by confirming some imperfect title.

Now, in regard to the forfeiture of these lands, it is what the canal company has sought to do for the past eight years—ever since the grant was conferred upon the Ontonagon and Brulé road. All this legislation, pure and simple, is of their seeking; and they have desired very much to have the forfeiture of the Ontonagon and Brulé grant made for the past five or six years. That is the way I understand it. I understand that the forfeiture of this grant removes one obstacle which stands in the way of their rights.

Mr. DAWES. I am after the facts. The Senator says he does not understand that this bill takes away any vested rights. That is true, because it can not; but the difficulty of the constituents of the gentleman and my constituents is that the rights of neither are vested, because of technical defects. I may be mistaken; I am inquiring.

Mr. PALMER. But they have certain equities, I imagine.

Mr. DAWES. Yes; the Senator has constituents whom he represents as bona fide settlers. I have constituents whom I represent as honest purchasers from the State of Michigan. Now, it turns out that there was no title in Michigan, and there was no opportunity for his settlers to perfect their title. So both of them have a defect and have no vested rights, which, as he says truly, we can not take away. The bill does not propose to take away vested rights. It could not take them away if it did propose to do so; but it proposes to forfeit to the United States all unearned railroad grants. Now, this stands on the record as an unearned railroad grant which Michigan, supposing it had the right, undertook to make a different disposition of; but there is a technical defect in that disposition, and settlers, observing that there was a technical defect proposed to locate upon these lands, and when there is a forfeiture they will be able to perfect their locations. That is the real state of the case, as I understand it.

Mr. PALMER. All I can say is that I am not posted in the critical niceties of the law, but I know that this forfeiture, pure and simple, is what the canal company have sought for the last seven or eight years. They regarded the forfeiture of the Ontonagon and Brulé grant as removing one obstacle from their path towards the confirmation of their titles, and if I am not correct the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands will correct me. I do not think it is going to injure their chances or their equities if we pass a forfeiture bill; but this confirmation of title is a question of such magnitude that I think the bill should be divested of it, because it will assume greater proportions than the bill itself. We are all pretty well agreed on the essence of the bill without the amendment, but if you attach this amendment we shall not get through with it in many weeks.

Mr. DAWES. Then the Senator proposes to except from the operation of this bill these lands in Michigan so that they will stand just as they did before this bill was introduced.

Mr. PALMER. I am perfectly willing to do that. I think they are left that way by the operation of the bill.

Mr. DAWES. That is what I desire to ascertain. If they are left just that way by the operation of the bill, I am content, but as I understand it, everybody's claim is cut off from the day this bill passes, and they become public lands de novo in the control of the United States. I may be mistaken; I am inquiring.

Mr. PALMER. I think the Senator is mistaken, but I should have more confidence in his judgment than in mine if he had looked up the subject.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I think that the matter of discussion between the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Michigan had better be deferred for the present. It is clearly in the power of the United States to cut off an equity, though it can not destroy a vested right. I agree that, with the language as it stands, the Senator from Massachusetts is right. Forfeiting the grant as declared in the first section of the bill would cut off all existing equities in favor of third parties, no matter what they have done short of a full compliance with the terms of the original grant.

The larger part of the public domain has already been disposed of, but what remains is still vastly important, and many irregular methods exist under which the public lands are being squandered. Under such circumstances it may not be unprofitable to consider briefly the legislation and the modes of administration by which the public lands have been and are still being alienated.

The principal laws on this subject are known as the pre-emption law, the homestead law, the common-school and agricultural-college grants, bounty-land grants to soldiers and sailors, half-breed-scrip grants to Indians, swamp and overflowed land grants, grants for internal improvements, railroad grants to States for the use of corporations, railroad grants to corporations in States and Territories, timber-culture grants, the desert-land law, and the law for the sale of timber lands. A brief review of the practical operations of these various modes of disposing of the public lands will show to what extent the Government has been able to secure cheap homes for the people, and how far the professed friendship for settlers has been thwarted by speculators.

Soon after the formation of the Government Congress commenced the disposition of the public lands by special grants and sales for cash at auction, which continued for about half a century. During this period the pioneers were forced to pay the middlemen, who bought the lands from the Government, large advances on the prices paid the United States. I have not ascertained the number of acres so purchased and resold or the amount of money realized by dealers in public lands while this policy prevailed, but the amount must have been large, as the land in several Western States was sold in that manner. Settlers upon the public lands in the early history of the Government were regarded as trespassers, and for many years it was the practice of Congress to pass acts for the relief of persons who entered upon the public domain and were making homes in the West.

THE PRE-EMPTION LAW.

In 1841 a general law was passed, which is known as the pre-emption law. That act provides that any citizen of the United States, or a person who has declared his intention to become such, may enter upon any surveyed quarter-section of the public land, and after having made a bona fide settlement thereon may purchase the same at the minimum price of $1.25 per acre. Special acts were soon thereafter passed granting the right to enter upon unsurveyed lands, until that right was finally extended to all unsurveyed public lands, with the condition that after the survey the pre-emption claim of the settler shall be made to conform to the legal subdivisions of the United States surveys.

The law authorizing public lands to be sold at auction unfortunately was continued in force after the passage of the pre-emption law. It became the practice, after lands had been surveyed and not entered by pre-emptioners for a given length of time, to advertise them for sale at auction to the highest bidder. Any lands so offered for sale and remaining unsold became subject to private entry (purchase) at $1.25 per acre. The surveys in the Valley of the Mississippi were cheap and easy. Large appropriations were obtained and the surveys extended much more rapidly than the population. It generally happened that before the surveyed lands were reached by the settler they were offered for sale, became subject to private entry, and were purchased by speculators at $1.25 per acre, to be resold to settlers at an enormous advance in price. The lands taken by pre-emptors and those sold at private entry were paid for in cash at $1.25 per acre, and entered in the books of the Government as cash sales. The records in the Land Office do not always show what lands were taken by pre-emptors and what lands were purchased at private entry. The best information that I have been able to obtain on this subject, by various estimates which I have caused to be made during the last twenty years, is that the speculators got more than one-half of the land entered as cash sales.

Since the passage of the homestead law the practice of offering lands for sale at public auction has been generally abandoned and private entries have been confined to lands previously offered. But inasmuch as the actual settler could obtain land without payment under the homestead law, comparatively few bona fide pre-emption entries have been made since the passage of that law. The principal use that has been made of the pre-emption law during the last twenty-five years has been for purposes of speculation. The names of fraudulent entrymen, or "dummies," were used to acquire land without actual settlement. The Commissioner of the General Land, in his report for 1887 (page 51 et seq.), gives a graphic description of the extent of these fraudulent entries, and points out various modes by which the frauds are perpetrated. From the showing made by him it would hardly be safe to estimate that as much as one-third of the pre-emption entries since the passage of the homestead law were made by bona fide settlers.

The aggregate amount of land disposed of under the pre-emption law to settlers, fraudulent pre-emptors, and at private entry up to June 30, 1887, is 182,762,926.90 acres. Making the liberal allowance of one-half to bona fide pre-emptors, we have—

	Acres.
Pre-emptors	91,381,463.45
Speculators	91,381,463.45

A profit of $5 per acre made by speculators on resale to settlers would be a low estimate, making the sum of $456,907,371.25 which has been paid as a bonus by the people to land operators under the pre-emption law.

Mr. MITCHELL. May I ask the Senator a question in that connection?

Mr. STEWART. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask whether the Senator, in giving the estimate he has of the amount of entries that are fraudulent under the pre-emption law, takes the entries which have been declared fraudulent finally by the Secretary of the Interior, or whether he takes simply those which have been charged to be fraudulent by special agents?

Mr. STEWART. I do not take either. If I took the estimates of the Commissioner of the General Land Office the amount of fraudulent entries would be greater than I have estimated. I judge from my knowledge of the situation and from the information I can obtain from all sources. Settlers had no legitimate use for the pre-emption law after the homestead law was passed, because under the pre-emption law a settler had to pay for his land $1.25 an acre, whereas under the homestead law he could get it by settlement, and I take it for granted that very few would prefer to pay unless they were using other people's money to obtain the land for somebody else.

Mr. MITCHELL. The proportion being so great as stated by the Senator, amounting to 50 per cent. of the whole entries, I asked the question. I stated, I thought distinctly, that my understanding was that only about 2 per cent. of all pre-emption entries had been declared fraudulent.

Mr. STEWART. I undertake to say that the fact that men entered under the pre-emption law when they could enter without paying anything by staying on their land indicates that they had some other object. I do not believe, as a matter of fact, that there have been one-third of the pre-emption entries since the passage of the homestead law made by men who really intended to settle on the land themselves; but they undoubtedly have complied with the letter of the law, but not with the spirit. Somebody else has got the land by some arrangement. I am now speaking of the lands entered under the pre-emption law since the passage of the homestead law. My estimate of 50 per cent. acquired by speculators under the pre-emption law previous to that time is based upon investigations made at my request in the Land Office and estimates made by former Commissioners of the General Land Office—Joseph S. Wilson, Judge J. M. Edmunds, and others—which I believe to be reliable.

I am not one of those who propose to rip up and unsettle these entries. When you have disposed of lands under a law and they are in the hands of private parties, the Government never does any good by disturbing titles and keeping the people in hot water. I am speaking of the operation of these laws simply for the purpose of showing what has been done under them and the caution that should be exercised in the future not to enter into a wholesale scheme of unsettling titles where men have entered in good faith. All this produces trouble in the community and always does harm.

THE HOMESTEAD LAW.

Soon after the passage of the pre-emption law in 1841 the question was agitated of allowing actual settlers to enter upon the public lands, and by a residence of five years to obtain title without the payment of any purchase-money to the United States. The question was frequently brought before Congress, and a bill for that purpose was finally passed during President Buchanan's administration, but was defeated by a veto. The homestead law now in force was passed in 1862. Under its operation 107,201,986.40 acres of land were disposed of to actual settlers up to June 30, 1887. This law was more beneficial to settlers than any other laws ever passed by Congress. If the remaining public lands could be cultivated without irrigation and were similar in character to the lands of the Mississippi Valley, every law for the disposition of the public lands, except the homestead law, ought to be repealed at once.

As I shall hereafter show, the homestead law has no application to the greater portion of the lands yet undisposed of, and can not be made available for their disposition.

COMMON-SCHOOL GRANT.

The grant of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections in each township in aid of common schools amounts to 67,893,919 acres. Some frauds have been perpetrated under this grant, but it has generally been well administered and has conferred, and is conferring, vast benefits by aiding to educate the masses in the new States. The fact that it was land in place and not land selected by speculators, and as most of the States allowed the school districts in which the lands were situated a voice in its disposition, accounts for a more equitable disposition of this grant than land for which scrip is granted, or land acquired by private entry.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE GRANT.

This grant was a donation of land scrip to the States in proportion to their representation in Congress, and amounted in the aggregate to 9,600,000 acres. The vicious feature of this grant was the issuance of scrip which could be located in advance of settlement. The actual settler was forced to buy the land so acquired at an enormous increase in price. A very small part of the money actually paid by settlers for the land was devoted to the cause of education. The profits of the speculators far exceeded the amount realized for educational purposes.

BOUNTY LAND-WARRANTS.

Under the acts of 1847, 1850, 1852, and 1855 bounty land-warrants were issued to soldiers of the Mexican war and the few surviving soldiers and sailors who had participated in earlier wars, aggregating 61,088,430 acres. The act of 1847 required these warrants to be located by the soldier in person. Afterwards, under a plea that he could not afford to travel to the place of location, Congress by the act of 1852 authorized entry by an agent, and afterwards by the acts of 1855 and 1858 the soldiers were authorized to assign their warrants. Of these warrants 58,752,910 acres had been located and patented up to June 30, 1886. Of this amount only about 3,000,000 acres were located by soldiers themselves, more than 55,000,000 acres being located by assignees. These warrants were sold by the soldiers to these assignees for from 10 to 60 cents per acre, and were located upon the public lands and resold to actual settlers at a profit not less than $5 an acre. While this bounty was of trifling advantage to the soldiers it operated as a direct tax of more than $275,000,000 upon the pioneers who settled in the Western States.

SCRIP GRANTS TO HALF-BREED INDIANS.

Various grants of land scrip were made to half-breed Indians. The aggregate amount of land issued for this purpose was over 1,500,000 acres. Although by the terms of these grants the land was to be entered by the Indians in person, it is asserted that every acre has been entered by white men.

SWAMP AND OVERFLOWED LAND GRANT.

I want to call particular attention to this remarkable record of the disposition of the public lands. The following statement concerning this grant is found in the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office for 1886 (pages 38–39). And here is one of the matters in which I concur pretty heartily with the general conclusions at which the Commissioner has arrived:

> In fifteen of the public-land States the swamp and overflowed lands, "made thereby unfit for cultivation," were granted by Congress to enable those States "to construct the necessary levees and drains to reclaim such lands." At the date of the original acts, in 1849 and 1850, it was estimated that 5,000,000 acres would satisfy the grant. Claims have been presented up to the present time for more than 75,000,000 acres, and patents have been issued for over 56,000,000 acres.
> The area thus claimed is greater than the whole surface of the States of New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, Vermont, Maine, New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, and West Virginia. * * *

There is little or no evidence to show that the lands conveyed to the States under this grant have ever been appropriated to the purposes for which the grant was made. The contemplated levees do not appear to have been constructed from the avails of the granted lands, the lands do not appear to have been reclaimed as a result of the grant, but the purposes of the grant would seem, generally at least, to have been totally defeated.

While a small portion of this grant is swampy and worthless without reclamation, the main body of it is rich alluvial bottom land and exceedingly productive, requiring no reclamation. It is difficult to conceive of a more reckless waste of the public domain than has been accomplished by this legislation. It is possible that a few States received something valuable for the grant.

The statement of the Commissioner may be slightly exaggerated, but it is substantially correct. The practice of giving away the public domain in large quantities under this grant was by no means its most objectionable feature. The question of what is swamp land and what is not has clouded the title to vast regions of country, and, notwithstanding constant litigation in Federal and State courts for the last forty years, about 21,000,000 acres are still suspended in the Land Office waiting investigation in regard to the question whether it is swamp or dry land. The swamp-land grant was held by the Supreme Court to be a grant in præsenti; consequently many of the States claimed the right to give title to the land in advance of United States surveys. After such survey the United States officials have claimed the land as dry land, and issued United States patents therefor. The result was constant and almost unending litigation.

Besides, the character of the land changes. In a new country, before the vegetation is trampled down or eaten up by stock, and before the timber on the surrounding hills is cut off, much land is swampy that afterwards becomes dry in settling the country. The character of the land is so changed by settlement, cultivation, and the raising of stock, that it is difficult to prove that it ever was swamp land. The result is, as before stated, unending dispute and uncertainty as to land titles, which is one of the greatest calamities that can befall any community.

I repeat that the worst feature of the swamp-land grant is the fact that there is no certain way of determining what is swamp and what is not swamp land. The passage of the swamp-land law created a most complicated confusion of titles. There should never be another grant allowed unless there is some definition that can be followed by honest men. It will not do to pass further laws, leaving the land to be disposed of dependent upon caprice or change of circumstances. I know of cases in which men have invested large amounts of money in the best of faith on the condition of the land as they found it twenty years ago, since which time the conditions are so changed that they are involved in litigation as to the character of the land. This has grown out of bad and uncertain legislation. I say the swamp-land law was improvident, extravagant legislation, which ought never to have been enacted.

GRANTS FOR INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS.

By the act of September 4, 1841, there were granted to certain States named, and to such States as might thereafter be admitted, 500,000 acres of land in aid of internal improvements, from which previous grants were to be deducted. This includes all the States, except Maine, Vermont, West Virginia, Kentucky, Tennessee, Texas, and the original thirteen, none of which contained public lands. There have also been granted for the same purpose, in addition to this, to the State of Ohio, 743,001.77 acres; to the State of Indiana, 1,409,861.61 acres; to the State of Iowa, 833,079.90 acres, and to the State of Wisconsin 683,728.43 acres. Various lesser grants have been made in aid of internal improvements, amounting to about 1,000,000 acres. The total thus disposed of amounts to about 13,669,671.71 acres. These grants were administered by the States, sometimes honestly and successfully, and sometimes wasted or absorbed by speculators to the detriment of settlement.

RAILROAD GRANTS TO CORPORATIONS AND STATES FOR USE OF CORPORATIONS.

The system of land-grant railroads was inaugurated during the administration of President Fillmore. From September 20, 1850, to February 9, 1853, grants were made to the States of Illinois, Mississippi, Alabama, Missouri, and Arkansas, in aid of the Illinois Central, Mobile and Chicago, Mobile and Ohio River, Southwest Branch of the Pacific, Hannibal and St. Joseph, St. Louis, Iron Mountain and Southern, Little Rock and Fort Smith, and Memphis and Little Rock Railroads, aggregating 8,372,883.85 acres. During the administration of President Pierce there were granted lands to the States of Florida, Iowa, Louisiana, Michigan, Wisconsin, Mississippi, and Minnesota, to aid in the construction of various railroads named in the grants, 19,678,176.79 acres. There were granted during President Lincoln's administration, to Michigan, Iowa, Wisconsin, Minnesota, and Kansas, and to corporations, to aid in the construction of railroads, 74,395,801.61 acres. The Union and Central Pacific Railroads and their branches and the Northern Pacific Railroad were included in these grants.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator includes Iowa. There were no 400,000 acres of land granted to the State of Iowa at that time. The aggregate seems large, but Iowa received a very small amount.

Mr. STEWART. It was very small to the State of Iowa during that time. The principal grant to Iowa was during President Pierce's administration.

During President Johnson's administration there were granted 34,001,297.77 acres to the States of Minnesota, Kansas, Arkansas, and Missouri, and to corporations. The Atlantic and Pacific grant constituted a portion of this amount. During the administration of President Grant there were granted to Minnesota and Michigan and to corporations 19,231,121.69 acres. The Texas Pacific grant is included in this amount.

Mr. PLATT. If the Senator from Nevada has it in his mind, I should like to ask him, so that it may go into the RECORD as part of his speech, when the last grant of public lands was made by Congress to a corporation to aid in the building of railroads, or to States for that purpose?

Mr. STEWART. The Texas and Pacific grant, which has since been forfeited, was the last.

Mr. PLATT. There have been none since?

Mr. ALLISON. That was in 1871.

Mr. STEWART. Yes; March 3, 1871.

All these grants amount to 155,504,994.59 acres, as will be seen by the report of the Public Land Commission of 1880, part 4, page 273, entitled "Public Domain."

The following forfeitures on account of failure of the corporations to complete the roads in the time prescribed have been declared by Congress:

By act of June 28, 1884 (23 Stats., 61), the grant to the Iron Mountain Railroad from Pilot Knob, in Missouri, to Helena, in Arkansas, was declared forfeited, and the land restored amounting to about 601,600 acres.

By act of January 31, 1885 (23 Stats., 296), the grant to the Oregon Central Railroad, in Oregon, adjacent to and coterminous with the uncompleted portions of said road was declared forfeited, and lands restored amounting to about 810,880 acres.

By act of February 28, 1885 (23 Stats., 337), the grant to the Texas and Pacific Railroad Company was declared forfeited, and lands restored amounting to about 15,692,800 acres.

By act of July 6, 1886 (24 Stats., 123), the grant to the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company was declared forfeited for all lands adjacent to and coterminous with the uncompleted portions of said road, and lands were restored in California and New Mexico amounting to about 10,795,480 acres.

By act of February 8, 1887 (24 Stats., 391), the grant to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company (now New Orleans Pacific) was declared forfeited, and lands were restored amounting to about 352,587 acres.

Thus making an aggregate of railroad lands forfeited of about 28,253,347 acres.

The Commissioner of the General Land Office estimates that 7,081,836 acres of the land granted to railroads where no roads have been built and the time for the construction of the roads has expired still remain subject to forfeiture. Congress will undoubtedly forfeit the larger part of this amount. If we deduct the 28,253,347 acres already forfeited from the original grants, to wit, 155,504,994.59 acres, the total amount of unforfeited grants to roads, we have 127,251,647.59 acres. Deduct from this the lands patented up to June 30, 1887, to wit, 49,745,715.27 acres, leaves 77,505,932.32 acres for which no patents have issued. The great mass of the lands already patented are agricultural lands east of the Rocky Mountains. The lands remaining and unpatented are in the interior, and a further deduction must be made in addition to what may hereafter be forfeited on account of worthless lands in the mountain and desert regions, and also for mineral lands, through which the roads pass. It is misleading to count the number of acres within the limits of these grants and assume that it is all agricultural land and fit for settlement.

No one familiar with the country through which these roads pass will estimate that more than one-third of the total area of the lands between the eastern slope of the Rocky Mountains and the Pacific coast can ever be inhabited. In order to make a fair comparison of the magnitude of the grants to railroads as to value with other lands sold by the Government, and particularly lands selected for purchase at private entry and for location with land warrants, and the rich and alluvial bottoms donated as swamp and overflowed, a deduction of at least two-thirds must be made for railroad grants in the region above mentioned. This would virtually reduce the aggregate of lands granted to railroads for which no patents have issued to 25,835,310.77 acres, which, added to the amount already patented, to wit, 49,745,715.27, leaves not more than 75,581,026.04 acres as the total amount of grants in aid of railroads.

On June 30, 1887, there had been constructed 17,898.06 miles of land-grant railroads, and it is estimated by well-informed railroad men that the construction of these aided roads has induced the building of much more than an equal amount of unaided roads, and it is safe to say that from 30,000 to 40,000 miles of the railroads of the United States have resulted directly and indirectly from the policy of the Government in aiding the construction of railroads by grants of land and money.

It is impossible to estimate the vast wealth created by the grand railroad system of the West. More than half the area of the United States otherwise inaccessible to settlers has been rendered available for homes for the people. Before the construction of railroads civilized man was compelled to reside sufficiently near navigable waters to enable him to interchange commodities by water transportation. The region from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean would have remained the hunting ground of the red man and the home of the deer, the elk, and the buffalo without the agency of railroads.

Both great political parties desired the construction of these roads. The system was commenced by the Democratic party and was continued under Republican rule. Blunders have undoubtedly been made—not so much from design as from a lack of accurate information of the country to be traversed by the roads and the amount of aid necessary to accomplish the purpose. The persons and corporations to whom the grants were made have exhibited indomitable energy and perseverance, and while they were benefiting the public they have undoubtedly aimed to benefit themselves in the administration of these grants. I have no apologies to make for the blunders of Congress in this respect, or for any mistakes or maladministration that may have occurred in building the roads or disposing of the lands. I am merely considering the general results of a policy inaugurated by the people, not by any particular party, and continued for a quarter of a century without opposition or complaint from any quarter.

The whole subject of land grants to railroads has gone into history, and whether good or bad can not now be remedied. It must be admitted by every candid man that the system of land grants to railroads supplanted a system of waste and extravagance of the public domain under which settlers were robbed of hundreds of millions of dollars without any public improvement or benefit to the community at large. The systems of private entry and land scrip, which we have already described, were abolished by land grants to railroads, which raised the even sections not granted to double minimum price and caused the abandonment of that ruinous system of offering lands at public auction for the purpose of making them subject to private entry. The exclusion of speculators and transportation furnished by the roads made it possible for settlers to acquire over 100,000,000 acres of land under the homestead law, most of which is situated too far from water transportation to be inhabited without railroads.

I do not propose to discuss the complaints that have been made in regard to some of the roads for the manner in which they have disposed of their lands. It was manifestly for their interests to furnish every facility for settlement, and as a general rule it is certain that the railroad companies have sold their lands on better terms than was formerly done by speculators, who acquired their lands from the Government at a nominal price by means of scrip and private entry. However that may be, all that can now be done is an honest adjustment of grants already made. Whatever legal rights have been acquired can not now be disturbed, and there is no danger that new rights will be conferred by legislation.

I make these remarks for the purpose of showing that no advantage can be obtained by either political party by making an issue on the past policy of the Government in granting aid to railroads, because both political parties indorsed the policy at the time and did so in pursuance of a well understood public sentiment. Whatever difference of opinion there may now be as to the wisdom of that policy, and whatever criticisms may be made of its imperfections—for which I have no excuses to offer—it is an issue of the past and not of the present. If it is necessary to utilize dead issues for present political purposes, why not make an issue of the swamp-land grant, or the private entry scheme, or the soldiers' bounty land-warrant enormity? No excuse can be given for the legislation which made such extravagant wastes of the public lands possible, except want of knowledge of the situation and want of care and attention in framing the laws. These schemes are also a matter of history which no future legislation can change, and their discussion is unprofitable except as a warning to Congress to avoid like mistakes in the future.

THE MINERAL-LAND LAW.

Under this law, up to June 30, 1887, 342,060.26 acres of land had been sold in small quantities. The law originated in a confirmation of the possessory rights acquired by miners on the public lands of the United States. The law has been generally satisfactory. It was inaugurated at a time when the question was agitated of selling the mines at auction without regard to the possessory claims of nearly 1,000,000 of inhabitants in the mining regions, which claims were recognized by local customs and laws. Congress confirmed these possessory claims and provided a method of acquiring title in conformity with the customs of miners. I gave that matter much study and attention, and with all the information and aid that I could obtain from every source, and in conjunction with other representatives of the Pacific States and Territories, secured the passage of the law now in force. The law is not perfect, but has been subject to less abuse than was feared by its friends at the time of its passage. It requires but slight amendments to cure the defects which have grown up under its operation to render it entirely satisfactory. The Committee on Mines and Mining at the present session has prepared a bill for that purpose, which it is believed will remedy the evils suggested.

THE TIMBER-CULTURE LAW.

The amount of land entered under the timber-culture law up to June 30, 1887, was 35,315,253.35 acres. The design of this law was to encourage the cultivation of forest trees. Some benefits have been secured under its operations, but it has been the occasion of much fraud and waste of the public lands. Under it lands can be claimed and held for several years with very little expense and without the cultivation of trees that are any benefit to the country or the land itself. The practice is to locate claims and hold them until the land becomes valuable for settlement, and then abandon them to homestead settlers on payment of the value of the land. This mode of acquiring land to be sold to settlers is entirely similar in its effect to purchasing land at private entry or acquiring it with scrip to be sold to settlers at high prices. The Commissioner of the General Land Office, in his report for 1885 (page 73), says:

> The proportion of totally fraudulent entries under this act (timber-culture act) is estimated at 90 per cent.

This estimate may be too high, but it is safe to say that at least 75 per cent. of the entries were made for speculative purposes, without any bona fide intention of complying with the provisions of the act.

In Montana and Idaho, and throughout the country generally, I am informed by settlers and officers of the Land Department, a custom exists to locate timber-culture claims for sale and for none other. When these locations become valuable for homesteads they are abandoned for a consideration. I want to call attention to that law, so that in future we may guard against the abuses that have grown up under it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CULLOM in the chair). The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair will interrupt the Senator to lay before the Senate the unfinished business.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope that will be informally laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa asks that the unfinished business be informally laid aside, not losing its place. It will be so ordered, if there be no objection; and the Senator from Nevada will proceed.

TIMBER AND STONE LAND LAW.

Mr. STEWART. Under the act of June 30, 1878, for the sale of timber lands in California, Oregon, Nevada, and Washington Territory, there have been sold 1,063,979.39 acres, at $2.50 per acre, for which the Government received $2,659,950.69. This law was very necessary to enable miners and others to obtain timber for their purposes in regions unfit for cultivation, but the law is not sufficiently guarded to prevent fraudulent entries. The Commissioner of the General Land Office condemns it in unmeasured terms and advises its absolute repeal, and publishes many pages in his report of investigations made by him of fraudulent entries. The very nature of the case makes it difficult to pass any law which will not be subject to abuse. Settlement is impossible on the lands described in the act, consequently one of the principal safeguards against fraud is not available; but it is absolutely necessary that some legal and legitimate mode shall exist for acquiring title to timber. Without it all the great industries of the interior would be crippled, if not destroyed.

That is perfectly manifest. The land can not be taken for homesteads; it can not be settled upon. It is the only timber available for the mines, and it is necessary for the use of the inhabitants to mine, farm, or conduct any other industry. But the act should be confined to timber lands, and strict proof should be required of the character of the land, and the price to be paid should bear some proportion to the value of the timber. From $2 to $10 per acre would be a fair price, the land to be graded by the Secretary of the Interior. There should also be a limitation upon the right of sale for a reasonable length of time.

I desire to say in this connection that the prosecution of miners out in the desert region for cutting a little brush for fire-wood for their cabins is a great annoyance. It has been carried in many instances to an extreme, producing great hardship without any good to the Government or any one else.

The repeal of the law would force whole communities to violate the law or abandon their property and their homes. The practical effect of prosecuting large numbers of people for doing what necessity compels would be more destructive to timber than it would be to allow every one to cut and remove timber from the public lands without compensation to the Government, or any Government supervision whatever. In the mountainous regions of the West more timber is destroyed by fire than is used for all the industrial pursuits combined. To save these forests from fire the community must be interested in their preservation. This can only be done by reasonable and just laws, which will restrain waste, and at the same time secure to the people wood and timber for necessary purposes. I call particular attention to this because there are many propositions pending looking to the absolute repeal of all laws authorizing the purchase of timber land in the two Houses of Congress.

DESERT-LAND LAW.

Under this law any person may enter upon a section of land on which crops can not be raised without irrigation, and upon the payment in advance of 25 cents an acre can acquire the privilege of irrigating the land within three years and obtaining a patent therefor upon the payment of an additional sum of $1 per acre. The act has been in force about eleven years. There were 15,057 entries made up to June 30, 1887, embracing 4,991,950.93 acres. Of this 854,779.70 acres have been reclaimed, final payments made, and patents issued.

This law is also defective and should be amended. At least two-thirds of all the remaining public land in the United States upon which homes for settlers can be established requires irrigation to fit it for successful cultivation. As a general rule, large expenditures are required for reservoirs and canals before the land can be occupied. It generally happens that thousands of acres can be irrigated by one system of hydraulic works. Individual settlers can do very little in the construction of these works. Their operations must necessarily be confined to the banks of streams and at places where water can be obtained at trifling expense. The great mass of the land must remain a waste unless a system can be devised for the co-operation of capital and labor. The present law is defective in many respects.

First. After the first payment three years are allowed to irrigate the land, and if nothing is done during that period there is no speedy method of restoring the land to the public domain, but practically it is held indefinitely and until it can be finally canceled, after long delay, by the Interior Department. A requirement of a certain expenditure during each year, and making a failure to comply with such condition an absolute forfeiture of all rights, with a further provision that in case of such failure the lands should be subject to entry by third parties as other public lands, would probably remedy this defect.

Second. There is another and still more serious objection to the law. An individual may select his land along a stream and appropriate the water in such a manner as to monopolize both land and water. This defect in the law can only be remedied by Government surveys, segregating the land capable of irrigation from other lands and requiring the entries to be made in such a manner as to utilize the available waters, both such water as may be found in running streams and such as may be accumulated in reservoirs constructed for that purpose.

Third. To avoid monopoly the Government should hold the title until the land is thoroughly reclaimed by irrigation. There is less danger of monopoly of lands which have been irrigated and are comparatively valueless without irrigation than in any other class of lands. Irrigated lands are much more productive than lands in the most favored regions which depend upon rainfall for moisture. The certainty of a good crop and frequently two crops in a year make much less land necessary to support a family in arid regions, where irrigation is necessary, than elsewhere. It is also true that much more labor and attention are required to farm irrigable lands than other lands. Neglect means a total failure of production and ruin. The great number of people required to make irrigated land profitable will naturally compel a division of the land among the people. Experience in California and elsewhere proves that the only method of realizing profits from irrigated lands is to divide it into small farms.

The subject of dealing with the public lands requiring irrigation is of the first importance.

The homestead law, as it was originally passed, is the best that can be devised for the public lands where the rainfall is sufficient for farming purposes. If it had been adopted and adhered to at the formation of the Government it would have saved many hundred millions of dollars which the settlers have been compelled to pay to speculators, as we have already shown. But the homestead law is not applicable to lands requiring irrigation. The experience of the past must not be disregarded in future legislation.

We ought not to repeat former mistakes. There should be no more swamp and overflowed lands granted to the States. The pre-emption law should be repealed. It is now used only for speculative purposes. Everything valuable in it has been superseded by the homestead law. No more land scrip ought ever to be issued to soldiers, or for educational purposes, or otherwise. It is an unmixed evil. No more lands should be granted to railroads. The necessity for such grants has passed. Every provision in the homestead law which allows a person to acquire title without a bona fide residence of five years should be repealed.

The commutation provision, and the provision allowing the time that soldiers served in the Army to be deducted from the period of residence are subversive of the principles of the law and injurious to the persons intended to be benefited thereby. It is no hardship for a person to stay at home five years. The fact that he does not want to stay there is prima facie evidence that he does not want the land for a home, but wants somebody else to have it for speculation. Better reward him in some other way than to make him an instrument for putting the public lands in the hands of speculators.

The timber-culture law should be repealed. No law ought to remain on the statute-books which compels settlers to buy off speculators to secure homes.

The only laws that should be preserved are the homestead law, amended as before suggested, the desert-land law, reformed so as to prevent frauds, the mineral-land law with slight amendments, and a well-guarded law which will enable persons to buy at a reasonable price sufficient timber land, unfit for cultivation. to live in the new States and Territories and develop mining and other industries.

The bill (H. R. 5445) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

JULIET G. HOWE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 300) granting a pension to Juliet G. Howe, which was in line 5 of the bill to strike out "twenty-five" and to insert "eighteen."

On motion of Mr. PADDOCK it was

Resolved, That the Senate non-concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives to the said bill, and ask a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

By unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Presiding Officer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER appointed Mr. PADDOCK, Mr. DAVIS, and Mr. TURPIE.

MRS. ELVIRA L. JOHNSON.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 752) to grant a pension to Mrs. Elvira L. Johnson, widow of Commodore Philip C. Johnson, which was in line 3 of the bill to strike out the word "fifty" and insert "thirty."

On motion of Mr. DAVIS, it was

Resolved, That the Senate non-concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives to the said bill, and ask a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

By unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Presiding Officer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER appointed Mr. SAWYER, Mr. FAULKNER, and Mr. BLAIR.

BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2083) to provide for the establishment of a Bureau of Animal Industry, and to facilitate the exportation of live-stock and their products, to extirpate contagious pleuro-pneumonia and other diseases among domestic animals, and for other purposes.

Mr. McPHERSON. I move that the bill now under consideration be laid aside informally to enable me to call up a bill.

Mr. PALMER. The Senator will permit me to say that there is a motion pending in regard to this bill, and after that is withdrawn I will send up a substitute for the present bill; and after it is read I shall ask that it be laid aside informally, with the intention of bringing it up to-morrow at 2 o'clock.

Mr. CHACE. I wish to state that at the conclusion of the reading of this bill I shall ask to take up the bill (S. 554) to amend Title LX, chapter 3, of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. When this bill was last under consideration a motion was pending, made by the Senator from New York [Mr. HISCOCK], to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary with instructions. That is the motion now pending.

Mr. HISCOCK. I withdraw that motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion to refer is withdrawn.

Mr. VOORHEES. Will the Senator from Michigan allow me to give notice that the day after to-morrow, at the conclusion of the morning business, I shall call up the resolution submitted by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] for the reference of the President's message to the Finance Committee, on which, with the consent of the Senate, I will submit some remarks.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President, the bill under consideration was offensive to many Senators on account of the radical ideas expressed therein as to the powers of the General Government, and acting on the suggestion of the Senator from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] that it should be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, I went over it with a distinguished member of that committee, and, with the consent of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, I now offer a substitute and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan offers an amendment as a substitute for the bill under consideration.

Mr. GEORGE. I feel it my duty to say that the substitute does not meet the approbation of all the members of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. PALMER. That is so; but it does meet the approbation of a majority of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed substitute will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and insert the following:

That for the purpose of better promoting the exportation of cattle and the products of live-stock from the United States, and for the purpose of increasing, promoting, and facilitating the commerce in cattle and their products among the several States of this Union, and for the purpose of removing the obstructions to such commerce with foreign nations and among the States when occasioned by the existence of contagious, infectious, or communicable diseases among cattle and other live-stock, and especially contagious pleuro-pneumonia and tuberculosis, the President of the United States is hereby authorized and required, immediately after the passage of this act, to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, four persons, who, together with the Commissioner of Agriculture, who shall be ex officio chairman, shall constitute a bureau in the Department of Agriculture, to be known as the board of animal industry. The board shall contain two practical cattle-growers of known executive ability and a competent veterinary surgeon. The salaries of said four members of said board, respectively, shall be $4,000 per annum. The said board shall exercise the following powers and discharge the following duties:

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the said board to investigate and report upon the condition of the domestic animals of the United States, their protection and use, and also inquire into and report the causes of contagious, infectious, and communicable diseases among them, or conditions likely to convey contagion, which for the purposes of this act shall be designated as "disease-conditions," and the means for the prevention and cure of the same, and to collect such information on these subjects as shall be valuable to the agricultural and commercial interests of the country: to examine and report upon the best means of treating, transporting, and caring for animals, and the best means for the suppression of the disease and disease-conditions of live-stock; and to cause investigation to be made as to the existence of contagious pleuro-pneumonia, tuberculosis, foot-and-mouth disease, rinderpest, glanders in horses, swine-plague, hog-cholera, and other diseases or disease-conditions of live-stock. The said board is hereby authorized to enter, either in person or by their duly authorized agents, any premises or places, including stock-yards, cars, and vessels, on or in which are any animals in course of or destined for transportation from one State to another or to a foreign country, or to or from any Territory of the States, or to or from the District of Columbia, or which premises, places, stock-yards, cars, and vessels are accustomed to be used for the keeping or in respect of such animals so in course of or destined for such transportation as aforesaid, in or at which they have reason to believe and do believe there exists any of such diseases, or disease-conditions, or any infectious matter or thing injurious to such animals, and to make search, investigation, and inquiry in regard to the existence thereof. Upon the discovery of the existence of any of the said diseases, or disease-conditions, or any such infectious matter or thing, the said board is hereby authorized to give notice, by publication, of the existence of such disease, diseases, or disease-conditions, or such infectious matter or thing, and the locality thereof, in such newspapers as they may select, and to notify, in writing, the officials or agents of any railroad, steam-boat, or other transportation company, or any individual or firm engaged in transportation business, in or through such infected locality, of the facts so ascertained. Said board is hereby authorized and required to establish and maintain such quarantine of animals so in the course of or destined for such transportation as aforesaid, and such premises, places, stock-yards, cars, and vessels so accustomed to be used for or in respect of the keeping and transportation aforesaid as they may deem necessary to prevent the spread of any such disease, diseases, or disease-conditions, and also to cause the appraisal of any such animal or animals before described affected with, or that have been exposed to, any such disease or disease-conditions, and also to cause the same to be destroyed, except as hereinafter provided. They shall cause all such animals so about to be destroyed to be appraised by three competent and disinterested men under oath, at the value thereof at the time of the appraisement, and the amount of the appraisement shall be paid out of any moneys appropriated by Congress for the purposes of this act.

SEC. 3. That the said board is hereby authorized and required to make, and from time to time alter, and publish rules and regulations not inconsistent with law providing for and regulating the agencies, methods, and manner of conducting and making the investigations aforesaid regarding the existence of said contagious diseases or disease-conditions; for ascertaining, entering, and searching the premises, places, stock-yards, cars, or vessels, respectively, described in section 2 of this act, for ascertaining what animals are so diseased or have been exposed to any such contagious diseases or disease-conditions; for making, reporting, and recording descriptions of the said animals so diseased or exposed or destroyed, and to make all other lawful and needful rules and regulations which may, in the judgment of the board, be deemed requisite to the full and due execution of the provisions of this act. All such rules and regulations, before they shall become operative, shall be approved by the President of the United States, and thereafter published in such manner as may be provided for in such regulations. Said board shall certify such rules and regulations as relate to the speedy and effectual suppression and extirpation of said diseases or conditions to the executive authority of each State and Territory, and invite said authorities to co-operate in the execution and enforcement of this act. Whenever the governor or other officer of a State or Territory, duly authorized by law, shall signify the assent of said State or Territory to such rules and regulations, or their readiness to co-operate for the extinction of any contagious, infectious, or communicable disease or disease-conditions, in conformity with the provisions of this act, or shall satisfy the said board that the laws, rules, and regulations of the said State or Territory, for the suppression of such diseases, are such as would prove efficient in eradicating such diseases, and shall signify the assent of the said State or Territory to co-operate for the extermination of such diseases, the said board shall co-operate with the proper authorities of said State or Territory for the extinction of such disease.

SEC. 4. That any person who shall knowingly and willfully refuse permission to the members of said board, or to either of them, or to any duly authorized agent of said board, to make, or who knowingly and willfully obstructs said board or any member thereof or any such agent, or either of them, in making all necessary examinations of or as respecting any such animal so described in section 2 of this act, and suspected or believed by said board or any member thereof or any such agent to be diseased, or to have been exposed as aforesaid, or in lawfully destroying the same, or who knowingly and willfully prevents or attempts to prevent said board, or any member thereof, or any such agent, or either of them, from entering upon any of the premises, places, stock-yards, cars, or vessels so described in section 2 of this act as aforesaid, where any of such diseases or disease-conditions are by said board, or any member thereof, or any such agent thereof, suspected or believed to exist, or who knowingly and willfully violates, or so attempts to violate, any quarantine established by said board under the authority of this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be punished by fine not exceeding $300 or by imprisonment not exceeding three months, or by fine and imprisonment, at the discretion of the court.

SEC. 5. That any person who being the owner of, or possessed of any interest in, or in possession of, any animal described in section 2 of this act affected with or which has been exposed to any of the diseases named in section 2 of this act, or any person who, as agent, common carrier, consignee, or otherwise, shall be charged with any duty in regard to any such animal so affected with or exposed to any of such diseases, or any officer or agent charged with any duties under the provisions of this act, who shall knowingly make any false representations to any person lawfully acting under the authority of this act concerning the existence of any case of any such disease, or disease-conditions, or the fact of the exposure of any animal described in section 2 of this act, to any such disease, or concerning the existence of any such disease-conditions in the premises, places, stock-yards, cars, or vessels described in section 2 of this act, or the location of any such case of disease or disease-conditions, or who shall knowingly transport, cause to be transported, or sell for transportation, as described in section 2 of this act, any animal known to be affected with, or to have been exposed to, or which he has reason to believe is affected with, or has been exposed to, any of the diseases or disease-conditions described in section 2 of this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, on conviction thereof, suffer the penalties mentioned in section 4 of this act.

SEC. 6. That if the laws of the State or Territory where any animal having any infectious or contagious disease, or any animal exposed to any infectious or contagious disease, exists provide means for the condemnation, appraisement, and slaughter of such animal, and the proper officers of such State or Territory shall, at the request of the said board or its agents, condemn, appraise, and slaughter such diseased or exposed animal, the said board is authorized to pay to the treasurer of the said State or Territory the amount of such appraisement and the cost of making the same, provided the appraised value of the animal so slaughtered shall be deemed reasonable by said board.

SEC. 7. That no person or persons owning or operating any railroad, and no owner or owners or master of any steam, sailing, or other vessel within the United States, shall receive for transportation, or transport from one State or Territory to another State or Territory, or to any foreign country, or from any State or Territory into the District of Columbia, or from the District of Columbia into any State or Territory or to any foreign country, any animal affected with any of the diseases named in section 2 of this act, or that has been exposed to any of such diseases or disease-conditions, especially the disease known as contagious pleuro-pneumonia, knowing such animal to be so affected or to have been so exposed; and no person or persons, company or corporation, shall deliver for such transportation to any railroad company, or to the master or owner of any vessel, any animal, knowing it to be affected with or to have been exposed to any such disease or disease-conditions; and no person or persons, company or corporation, shall drive on foot or transport by any means of conveyance from one State or Territory to another, or to any foreign country, or from any State or Territory into the District of Columbia, or from said District into any State or Territory, or to any foreign country, any animal, knowing the same to be affected with, or to have been exposed to, any such disease or disease-conditions. Any person, company, or corporation violating the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be punished by fine not exceeding the sum of $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 8. That when the President of the United States shall be satisfied that the said contagious or infectious diseases, or any of them, no longer exist in any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, or any part thereof, previously declared infected, he shall, by proclamation, declare such State or Territory, or District, or part thereof, free from such disease, diseases, or disease-conditions. When the President shall be satisfied that said diseases, or any of them, have been extirpated throughout the United States, he shall proclaim such fact, and cause the same to be made known to foreign governments.

SEC. 9. That it shall be the duty of the several United States district attorneys to prosecute, by due course of law, all violations of this act which shall be brought to their notice or knowledge by any person making the complaint under oath; and also to prosecute without such complaint all such violations as he shall deem proper, and such prosecutions shall be heard in any district or circuit court of the United States or Territorial court of general jurisdiction holden within the district in which the violation of this act shall be committed, and such courts shall respectively have jurisdiction thereof.

SEC. 10. That the said board shall keep an office, and shall make and preserve a full record of all rules and regulations promulgated under the provisions of this act, of all payments and expenses incurred under its authority, and all other transactions performed by said board in the discharge of their duties as herein provided; and the said board shall, on or before the first Monday in November of each year, and at such other times as they may deem conducive to the public interests, report to the President full and accurate accounts of their expenditures, and other proceedings under the provisions of this act, and of the condition of said diseases throughout the United States, who shall communicate the same to Congress.

SEC. 11. That the said board shall have power, and are hereby authorized, to employ skilled veterinarians, and such other agents and employés as they may deem necessary to carry into effect the provisions of this act, and to fix the compensation of the person or persons so employed, and to terminate such employment at their discretion; and they are authorized, out of any moneys appropriated for the purposes of this act, to make such expenditures as may be needed for the actual and necessary traveling expenses of themselves and their said employés, payment of such employés, rents, office expenses, expenses of disinfecting premises, cars, vessels, and other places, appraising and destroying diseased and exposed animals and paying for the same, and such other expenses and expenditures as they may find to be actually necessary to properly carry into effect the intent and provisions of this act.

SEC. 12. That in order to promote the exportation of live-stock from the United States the board shall cause to be made special investigation as to the existence of pleuro-pneumonia, or any contagious, infectious, or communicable disease of live stock along the dividing lines between the United States and foreign countries, and along the lines of transportation between all parts of the United States and ports to and from which live-stock may be exported or imported, and make report of the results of such investigation to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall, from time to time, establish such lawful regulations concerning the exportation and importation of live-stock as he shall deem needful in the premises.

SEC. 13. That all expenditures under this act shall be made on vouchers to be certified by the chairman of said board.

SEC. 14. That for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of this act for the present fiscal year, any unexpended balance of appropriations made for the use of the existing Bureau of Animal Industry shall be immediately available for the purposes of this act.

SEC. 15. That the Commissioner of Agriculture shall furnish for the use of the board the necessary office rooms, furniture, fuel, lights, stationery, etc., necessary for the transaction of the business of said board.

SEC. 16. That the act entitled "An act for the establishment of a Bureau of Animal Industry, etc.," approved May 29, 1884, and all other acts and parts of acts, so far and only so far as the same are inconsistent or in conflict with the provisions of this act, be, and the same are hereby, repealed: Provided, That all agreements and arrangements for co-operation between the Bureau of Animal Industry and any State or Territory, existing at the time of the passage of this act, shall continue until otherwise ordered by said board; and all employés of the said bureau shall continue until relieved by the said board.

SEC. 17. That all offenses against any of the acts or parts of acts hereby repealed shall be prosecuted, tried, and determined in the same manner and with the same effect as if this act had not passed.

Mr. PALMER. As several Senators desire to look over the amended bill and this is the first opportunity they have had, I yield to their request to have the measure laid aside informally.

Mr. PLATT. With the idea of taking it up, when?

Mr. PALMER. Taking it up to-morrow at 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan consents to having the bill under consideration laid aside informally, which will be done unless objection is heard, and it will come up as the unfinished business to-morrow at 2 o'clock.

INTERNATIONAL COPYRIGHT.

Mr. CHACE. I move now to take up for consideration Senate bill 554.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island moves that the Senate take up for consideration the next special order, being the bill (S. 554) to amend Title LX, chapter 3, of the Revised Statutes.

The question is on that motion.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

REGISTRY OF BARGES.

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the Senator from Rhode Island yield to me that I may call up a bill which will not provoke discussion? As his bill is one that may provoke a great deal of discussion, I ask him to yield for a few moments before proceeding with his bill.

Mr. CHACE. If the Senator's bill will not take much time, I shall yield. I give way for a short time.

Mr. McPHERSON. I ask to lay aside the pending bill informally for the purpose of taking up Order of Business 800, being the bill (S. 1483) for the registry of the barges Albert M, Condor, and Adelante.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey asks that the pending bill be laid aside informally and the bill indicated by him be taken up. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1483) for the registry of the barges Albert M, Condor, and Adelante. It proposes to authorize the Commissioner of Navigation to admit to registry, as vessels of the United States, the foreign vessels Albert M, Condor, and Adelante, owned by John Scully, of South Amboy, N. J., on satisfactory proof that he is a citizen of the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NEW YORK INDIAN LANDS.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask the Senator from Rhode Island if he will not yield to me as well as to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. CHACE. I do not want to lose my position, and I do not want to lose much of my time.

Mr. PLUMB. There is a House bill here which ought to be disposed of.

Mr. CHACE. I will yield temporarily.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 802, being House bill 1406.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. 1406) to provide for the sale of certain New York Indian lands in Kansas was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. HISCOCK. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Kansas what Indians these are.

Mr. PLUMB. This is to provide for a fraction of a New York Indian tribe that went to Kansas.

Mr. HISCOCK. Are they in the occupation of the lands?

Mr. PLUMB. No, sir, and never have been.

Mr. PLATT. They are to get pay for the lands.

Mr. HISCOCK. Is the sum absolutely fixed?

Mr. PLUMB. The sum is absolutely fixed. Each person went there with the intention of complying with the terms of the treaty between the tribe and the Government and made selections. On these selections a certain certificate was issued to them by the Secretary of the Interior. They are to have the proceeds of the sales of these lands.

Mr. HISCOCK. The question I mean to suggest is whether the lands ought not to be sold to the highest bidder.

Mr. PLUMB. They have been practically. They have been settled on for the last thirty years.

Mr. HISCOCK. How many acres are there?

Mr. PLUMB. About 32 half sections of land.

Mr. HISCOCK. Have the tribes been heard in reference to the bill?

Mr. PLUMB. I can not say that they have been at this session. The whole matter has been settled by the Interior Department. The Senator who has charge of the bill can state as to that point. I can not state as to the present session, but they have been heard heretofore. The Senator from Connecticut has had charge of it heretofore.

Mr. PLATT. These New York Indians were not any tribe of Indians that removed from New York, but they were individual Indians who went, as they supposed, under a treaty that provided for the removal of the Six Nations of New York Indians and the St. Regis tribe to these lands in Kansas. There were only a few of them that went. About two hundred of them were selected by Dr. Hogan and taken out there, and after they had been there awhile in 1860 the Commissioner of the General Land Office allotted to thirty-two of them who were found there land amounting to 320 acres each, but these thirty-two Indians never occupied the lands. They were squatted upon by settlers and the settlers have been in occupation of them ever since, and these thirty-two or their heirs are scattered about everywhere, some in the Indian Territory and others are distributed around in different portions of the country.

There has been a long history of this matter. At one time it is said, and I think truly, that the Indians, by their attorney, agreed to take two and a half dollars an acre for the lands which had thus been allotted to them. I do not think that this allotment ever conveyed any title in fee to these Indians. The Commissioner of the General Land Office in allotting the land evidently thought he was pursuing the treaty of 1838; but that only provided for the allotment of lands to the tribe. There never was anything in that which provided for the allotment of lands to individual Indians. So I do not think they ever had any actual title to these lands, but they evidently had an equitable right to the lands, and the only question there has ever been is as to the amount which should be paid to them.

Mr. HISCOCK. You say they were never occupied by the Indians?

Mr. PLATT. They have never occupied them at all, and the only question is about the amount that should be paid.

It may be remembered that the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs has once reported in favor of paying a larger sum than is here proposed. The House passed the bill paying $2.50 an acre to these Indians or their heirs wherever they might be found. Acting for the committee at one time I reported a bill to pay them $4.54 an acre. I will not stop to explain how that sum was arrived at. It was the sum which the Commissioner thought ought to be paid to them. The bill was recommitted to the committee, and upon the whole the committee thought that for the purpose of settling a controversy which has run over twenty years perhaps it was best to pass the bill as it came from the House, fixing $2.50 an acre.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 393) for the relief of Frances Anne Pyne Ricketts, with an amendment in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

INTERNATIONAL COPYRIGHT.

Mr. CHACE. I ask that Senate bill 554 be now proceeded with.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 554) to amend Title LX, chapter 3, of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read.

Mr. CHACE. There are a few verbal amendments besides those reported by the committee which I should like to have acted upon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator desire to have the amendments reported by the Committee on Patents disposed of at this time?

Mr. CHACE. I think they had better be taken up seriatim. I can move the verbal amendments as we go along. The first amendment would be to strike out the letter "s" in my name and insert the letter "e." The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] suggests that the committee amendments be acted upon first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair was trying to suggest that course to the Senator. The amendments reported by the Committee on Patents will be stated in their order.

The first amendment reported by the Committee on Patents was, in section 1, line 22, before the word "publish," to strike out "or," and after the word "publish" to insert "dramatize, translate, or import," and the words "so printed, published, or imported" shall read "so printed, published, dramatized, translated, or imported;" so as to make the clause read:

That in sections 4964 and 4965 the words "publish or import" shall read "publish, dramatize, translate, or import," and the words "so printed, published, or imported" shall read "so printed, published, dramatized, translated, or imported."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out of section 2 the following words:

That at the end of section 4957 the following clause be inserted:

"Provided, That if the author, designer, or composer of the book or other article for which a copyright is applied for be not a citizen of the United States or resident therein, then the name of such copyright, book, or other article shall be recorded as above in the office of the Librarian of Congress, not later than the day of its publication in the country of its origin; and in case of a book, printed musical composition or photograph, two copies of the best edition of the same printed in the United States shall be deposited with the Librarian of Congress within the term of three months after the date of recording such copyright, in default whereof such copyright shall be held void and of no effect, and after the recording of any copyright as above."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert, in lieu of the words just stricken out:

SEC. 2. That section 4956 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, amended so that it shall read as follows:

"SEC. 4956. No person shall be entitled to a copyright unless he shall, before publication in this or any foreign country, deliver at the office of the Librarian of Congress, or deposit in the mail within the United States, addressed to the Librarian of Congress, at Washington, D. C., a printed copy of the title of the book or other article, or a description of the painting, drawing, statue, statuary, or a model or design for a work of the fine arts, for which he desires a copyright, nor unless he shall also, not later than the day of the publication thereof in this or any foreign country, deliver at the office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington, D. C., or deposit in the mail within the United States, addressed to the Librarian of Congress, at Washington, D. C., two copies of such copyright book or other article, printed from type set within the limits of the United States, or in case of a painting, drawing, statue, statuary, model, or design for a work of the fine arts, a photograph of the same."

Mr. CHACE. In line 10, after the word "drawing," I move to insert the word "chromo;" so as to read:

Description of the painting, drawing, chromo, statue, statuary, etc.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHACE. In line 18, after the word "or," I move to strike out the words "other article," and insert "dramatic composition;" so as to read:

Two copies of such copyright book or dramatic composition, printed from type set within the limits of the United States.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHACE. In line 20, after the word "of," I move to insert the words "engraved works, photographs, or other similar articles, two copies of the same, or in case of;" so as to read:

Or in case of engraved works, photographs, or other similar articles, two copies of the same, or in case of a painting, drawing, statue, statuary, etc.

Mr. CHACE. In line 20, the word "statute" should be changed to "statue."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That correction will be made. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Patents was, in section 2, after the word "importation," at the end of line 22, to strike out "of any" and insert "into the United States of any book or other;" in line 24, after the word "copyrighted," to strike out "into the United States;" in the same line, after the word "it," to strike out "is;" in line 25, before the word "prohibited," to insert "is;" and in the same line, after the word "prohibited," to strike out "and" and insert:

Except in the cases specified in section 2505 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and except in the case of persons purchasing for use and not for sale, who import not more than two copies at any one time, in each of which cases the written consent of the proprietor of the copyright, signed in the presence of two witnesses, shall be furnished with each importation;

So as to read:

During the existence of such copyright the importation into the United States of any book or other article so copyrighted shall be, and it hereby is, prohibited, except in the cases specified in section 2505 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and except in the case of persons purchasing for use and not for sale, who import not more than two copies at any one time, in each of which cases the written consent of the proprietor of the copyright, signed in the presence of two witnesses, shall be furnished with each importation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, line 33, before the word "all," to strike out "detain" and insert "destroy;" in the same line, before the word "articles," to strike out "copyrighted" and insert "prohibited;" in line 34, after the words "at the," to strike out "custom-houses" and insert "custom-house or otherwise brought into the United States;" and in line 35, after the word "transmitted," to strike out "in" and insert "to;" so as to read:

All officers of customs and postmasters are hereby required to seize and destroy all copies of such prohibited articles as shall be entered at the custom-house or otherwise brought into the United States, or transmitted to the mails of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, line 36, before the word "in," to strike out "but;" in line 37, before the word "translations," to insert "only;" in line 39, before the words "of the same," to strike out "translations" and insert "translation;" and in line 40, after the word "permitted," to strike out:

Unless the original shall also be copyrighted and an American edition thereof shall be issued within three months after the date of entry of copyright.

So as to read:

In the case of books in foreign languages, of which only translations in English are copyrighted, the prohibition of importation shall apply only to the translation of the same, and the importation of the books in the original language shall be permitted.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, line 11, after the word "mails," to strike out "and such lists shall likewise contain the title or description of all articles on which copyright shall have expired or become void under the proviso of section 4957;" in line 24, after "United States," to insert "except upon the conditions above specified;" and in line 26, after the word "act," to insert "during the term of the copyright;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. That at the end of section 4958 the following clause be inserted:

"Provided, That the charge for recording the title or description of any article entered for copyright, the production of a person not a citizen or resident of the United States, shall be $1, to be paid as above into the Treasury of the United States, to defray the expenses of lists of copyrighted articles to be printed by the Secretary of the Treasury, at intervals of not more than a week, for distribution to the collectors of customs of the United States and to the postmasters of all post-offices receiving foreign mails; and it is hereby made the duty of the Librarian of Congress to furnish to the Secretary of the Treasury the material for the publication of such weekly lists, for which service he shall be authorized to employ an additional clerk, at a salary of $1,200 per annum; and such weekly lists, as they are issued, shall be furnished to all parties desiring them, at a sum not exceeding $5 per annum; and the Secretary and the Postmaster-General are hereby empowered and required to make and enforce such rules and regulations as shall prevent the importation into the United States, except upon the conditions above specified, of all articles copyrighted under this act during the term of the copyright."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This concludes the amendments of the Committee on Patents.

Mr. CHACE. In section 4, line 8, I move to strike out the word "additions" and insert "editions." It is an error of the printers.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHACE. On the first page of the bill, line 5, before the word "shall," I move to insert the word "the;" and in line 7 I move to strike out the word "words" and insert "works."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further amendment as in Committee of the Whole, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL. Before the bill is reported to the Senate I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. CHACE. Mr. President, this bill comes before Congress under different auspices from those under which any of the other bills have ever been presented. There is, so far as I am aware, no class of people nor are there any particular interests among the people of the United States who are opposed to this bill. On former occasions when bills have been presented looking toward the extension of the principle of copyright protection to authors not citizens of the United States, there have been either present in the bill some provision which has drawn opposition from some interest or there has been lacking from such bill some provision which has so far worked a defect as to call for the opposition of some interest.

At present happily the committee feel that they are able to present to the Senate a bill which commands the united, harmonious support, almost without an individual exception, in fact I think I may safely say without one, of every author, for, as represented by the Authors' Copyright League of this country, they are all unanimously in favor of the adoption of the bill. The publishers of the country who have upon other occasions stood in an antagonistic position to the authors are now united in support of the bill. The men who carry on the business of printing are, so far as I am aware, also in favor of it; and the men who do the work of type-setting are the most earnest in their support of it. I think no one class of all those directly interested have been more earnest in their expression than have been the printers through the representatives of their organized bodies.

Large numbers of people who feel an interest in literature have expressed themselves in the strongest terms in favor of the bill, and so far as I am aware there has been, perhaps, with a single exception, no voice raised in the presence of the committee in opposition to the bill; and perhaps I might say, without taking too much liberty, that in that case I think the individual was simply pursuing a course that he had adopted long years ago in opposition to other bills that were perhaps objectionable, and he was following that course more from the force of habit than from any real opposition to the bill.

The purpose sought to be accomplished by the enactment of this bill is to secure to foreign authors, compilers, and artists the same privileges of copyright as are granted by our present domestic statute to the American author and artist, and soon requiring of foreign authors similar and only similar conditions in regard to registration and deposit and otherwise, with the single exception that the provisions in section 4956 in regard to the delivery of a printed copy before publication are changed somewhat to meet the necessities of the case arising from the residence of the foreign author. There is also a slight increase in the fee for recording—from 50 cents, the charge made to a citizen of the United States, to $1 for a foreign author. This increase is made in order to cover the extra expense of increased clerical force, and the printing of the weekly lists of foreign articles copyrighted.

The object of the change in section 4952—and I will go into this thing a little in detail, so that Senators who have not paid attention to it may, if they choose to spend their time in reading my remarks, be aided a little—where the words "A citizen of the United States, or resident therein, who shall be," are stricken out, is apparent. The last sentence in the same section, the change is intended to cover the right of all authors to dramatize and translate their own works without any action on their part being necessary to reserve said right. The change in section 4954 simply extends the provisions of the bill to foreigners; so also that in section 4967. Section 4971 is repealed for the same purpose.

The words "publish or import," in sections 4964 and 4965 are changed so as to read, "or publish," for the same purpose.

No attempt has been made to alter or amend the general provisions of the present copyright law, except so far as is necessary for this purpose.

It is claimed by many that the present law is imperfect and requires considerable amendment and extensions to meet the wants and suitably protect and guard the rights of authors and publishers.

The committee did not believe that it was expedient at the present time to take up that subject, the object being now simply to extend this principle to foreign authors, and thereby gain for our own American authors rights in foreign countries, which at the present time they are not able to avail themselves of.

The dividing line between copyright and the law of trade-mark is very narrow. At some future time it may be desirable to legislate in regard to that matter, but of that the committee did not see fit at the present time to take any account.

It would be too trite to allude to the provision of the Constitution, perhaps, but I will introduce it at this place in my speech.

The Constitution provides, article 1, section 8, clause 8, that in order to promote "the progress of science and the useful arts," Congress may "secure for limited times to authors and inventors the exclusive rights to their respective writings and discoveries."

Under the Confederation no such power existed.

On motion of James Madison, in May, 1783, Congress passed an act recommending to the States that they pass acts securing copyright for a brief period—I think it was for fourteen years—and I will print in my remarks a copy of the resolution introduced by Madison at that time. I will not detain the Senate to listen to it now.

Connecticut and Massachusetts had already passed copyright laws running for twenty-one years. New York and New Jersey passed copyright laws in 1786.

Virginia passed a copyright act in 1785, although the governor of the colony of Virginia, Sir William Berkeley, in 1671 used the following remarkable language in one of his messages:

I thank God there are no free schools nor printing (in Virginia), and I hope we shall not have these hundred years; for learning has brought disobedience and heresy and sects into the world, and printing has divulged them, and libels against the government. God keep us from both.

Other States also took the matter up. I should say here in parenthesis that several of these acts accorded to foreigners the rights of copyright.

After the adoption of the Constitution, in the year 1790, the first United States copyright law was enacted. This gave to citizens and residents the privilege of copyright for fourteen years, with a renewal of fourteen more if the author were living at the time of expiration of the first term.

Sundry amendments were made to the law in 1802 and 1819, changing the conditions and extending its scope.

In 1831 the previous acts were consolidated and the term extended to twenty-eight years, with a renewal for fourteen years, to the author, his widow, or his children, which is the condition existing in the domestic law at the present time.

In 1834 recording of the assignment in the court of original entry was required.

In 1846 one copy was required to be delivered to the Smithsonian Institution and one to the Library of Congress.

In 1856 the right to dramatize and perform was added. In 1859 the duty of depositing with the Smithsonian Institution was repealed, and the Interior Department instead of the State Department was made the custodian of deposit.

In 1861 an amendment provided for an appeal of suits to the United States Supreme Court. In 1865 an act was passed requiring deposit in the Library of Congress within one month of publication, and it also included photographs. Up to this time it applied only to literary productions. In 1867 an amendment provided $25 penalty for failing to so deposit.

In 1870 the law was revised and consolidated and extended to include paintings, drawings, chromos, statuary, models, and designs, doing away with the district court system of registration, making the Librarian of Congress the copyright officer, and requiring two copies to be filed with him within ten days after the publication.

In 1874 the act was amended providing a short form of record and relegating labels and trade-marks to the Patent Office.

I am indebted to the admirable summary of the principles and law of copyright, by R. R. Bowker, of New York, for the saving of much labor in looking up the history of copyright legislation in this country, and I desire here to make this acknowledgment to him for the great service he has done authors, publishers, and the public in the preparation of that volume. Any Senator who wishes to look at it will find a considerable amount of information on the subject.

Such is a very cursory history of domestic copyright legislation.

In 1837 Henry Clay presented to the Senate a petition of British authors asking that copyright privilege in this country should be given to foreign authors, which I will take the liberty to print with my remarks—I will not detain the Senate by reading them now—copies of some of those quotations signed by the most eminent authors in England. That petition was referred to a select committee, which made a report, taking high ground in favor of the rights of foreign authors. In their report they use the following language:

That authors and inventors have, according to the practice among civilized nations——

Mr. PLATT. That report was made by Henry Clay?

Mr. CHACE. I am reading from the report made by Henry Clay. The report was made, I think in 1838, just fifty years ago. In their report the committee use the following language:

That authors and inventors have, according to the practice among civilized nations, a property in the respective productions of their genius is incontestible; and that this property should be protected as effectually as any other property is by law, follows as a legitimate consequence.

Authors and inventors are among the greatest benefactors of mankind. They are often dependent exclusively upon their own mental labors for the means of subsistence, and are frequently, from the nature of their pursuits or the constitution of their minds, incapable of applying that provident care to worldly affairs which other classes of society are in the habit of bestowing. These considerations give additional strength to their just title to the protection of the law.

It being established that literary property is entitled to legal protection, it results that this protection ought to be afforded wherever the property is situated. A British merchant brings or transmits to the United States a bale of merchandise, and the moment it comes within the jurisdiction of our laws they throw around it effectual security. But if the work of a British author is brought to the United States, it may be appropriated by any resident here and republished, without any compensation whatever being made to the author. We should be all shocked if the law tolerated the least invasion of the rights of property in the case of the merchandise, whilst those that justly belong to the works of authors are exposed to daily violation, without the possibility of their invoking the aid of the laws.

The committee think that this distinction in the condition of the two descriptions of property is not just, and that it ought to be remedied by some safe and cautious amendment of the law.

No action was taken on that report. The question came up again in Congress in 1853, when another bill was introduced, which met the same fate.

In 1873 another bill to establish international copyright was introduced, and referred to a joint committee of the Senate and House of Representatives, of which Senator Morrill, of Maine, was chairman. But so great was the conflict of opinion and so earnest and persistent the efforts of the parties who demand the right to "pirate" books, that the committee were discouraged, and, in utter despair, were not able to reconcile themselves or the different parties, and the result was an entire failure.

The President of the United States has in two of his messages recommended the passage of a law recognizing the rights of foreign authors, and I will introduce and print in my remarks extracts from those messages.

The President of the United States also communicated to the House of Representatives in a special message the proceedings of a convention comprising nearly all the civilized nations of the world, who sat recently at Berne, in Switzerland, for the purpose of establishing an international copyright union, recommending at that time that the United States send commissioners to that union. The result of the sessions of that conference was the drafting of a treaty providing for an international copyright union similar to the postal union which is in existence, and to which the United States was a party. Into that union entered all the great Governments of Europe, Great Britain, France, Spain, Germany, Austria, Italy, Switzerland, and two or three of the Governments of South America, Mexico, and several of the islands. By the provisions of their laws most of them now grant to the citizens of any country which grants to their citizens copyrights all the privileges which inure to citizens of their own country.

I make one remark here, and I desire to call the attention of Senators to it, because further on in the consideration of the bill no doubt the question of reciprocity will be presented. I desire to say here that there will be no need, it seems to me, of any section providing for reciprocity in this bill, because in the event of the bill becoming a law, particularly in regard to Great Britain, the great English-speaking nation of the world, and her colonies, by the provisions of the British law as it stands now, our citizens will, at the moment our Government accords to the citizens of Great Britain the privileges of copyright, be they more or less in extent so they are materially a granting of the privileges of copyright in this country—I say by the provisions of English law our citizens will immediately become vested with those rights. All that will be necessary will be for the Government to issue what is called an order of council announcing that fact, and then, whenever a citizen of the United States shall have brought proof that he has acquired copyright in his own country, he will be immediately accorded by the laws of Great Britain all the privileges of copyright that a citizen of Great Britain would possess.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to ask the Senator from Rhode Island whether laws of similar import are in force in the several British possessions, as Australia, the Dominion of Canada, and elsewhere?

Mr. CHACE. They are. It extends over the whole British dominion.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Is there any provision in this bill, or is it contemplated to put such a provision in it, as will withdraw from English authors within any possession of Great Britain the privileges of this bill in the event that they fail to accord like privileges under their laws to our citizens?

Mr. CHACE. The Senator's question is included in the other question which I raised, and to which I am addressing my remarks. That covers the question of reciprocity, of course; and I think if the Senator will recall what I said he will see that I had already answered the question. But I will repeat it. It is not proposed to put in any such provision, and the committee believe that it is not necessary or best, for the term "reciprocity" to be strictly construed would invest the provisions of the law in either country necessarily with conditions exactly parallel and equal. That becomes an impossibility without an entire revision of the whole copyright laws of the world, because, as the Senator will see further along as I proceed with my remarks, the copyright laws of each nation vary in some of their provisions from the provisions of the copyright law of every other nation, in the length of time, in the conditions expressly required on the part of the author, and in regard to various other matters. So that to insist upon absolute reciprocity would introduce very great difficulties, and we should gain nothing.

It is not proposed to make any such provision, for the reason that by such a provision the committee do not believe that citizens of the United States would gain any particular advantage, but on the other hand would be likely to lose.

This principle of the recognition and acknowledgment and protection of the rights of foreigners in property of this character has long been recognized and acted upon by this Government in regard to patents. George Washington very early interested himself in this and the patent question. I am indebted to Moncure D. Conway for a copy of an unpublished letter written by George Washington, which I will read to the Senate, and for the possession of which I wish to give due acknowledgment to that gentleman. This letter is in reply to a letter from Dr. Priestley. It is in regard to patents, but it covers exactly the same international principle. The protection to patentees is provided for under the same section of the Constitution, and depends upon the same principle. Therefore I read this letter from Washington, as it may interest Senators, and as I should like to have it published in my remarks. Washington said:

The President of the United States has, agreeable to his promise, caused the laws of the United States "to promote the progress of useful arts, etc.," to be examined, and finds that the last act passed on this subject, namely, on the 21st of February, 1793 (repealing the first act of the 10th of April, 1790), confines the granting of patents to citizens of the United States. The first act of the 10th April, 1790, does not appear to have limited this right to any particular description of persons, and why it is confined in the second the President can, at this time, see no good reason; but he will take occasion to inquire into the cause of this limitation, and if it should not appear improper to relinquish it, he can have no doubt of the disposition of the Legislature to make such alteration in the existing law as will give to the United States the advantage which may arise from the useful inventions and improvements of foreigners, as well as of our own citizens.

I merely read this letter because it covers the same principle which is sought to be provided in the enactment of this bill.

I quote as follows from the report which I had the honor to submit during the Forty-ninth Congress to the Senate on behalf of the Committee on Patents:

In 1793 the act of 1790, relating to patents, was repealed, and a new act passed providing for the issuance of patents to citizens of the United States only. The act of April 17, 1800, extended the privileges of the act of 1793 to all aliens "who shall, at the date of application, have been residing in the United States for two years."

The act of July 3, 1832, extended the privileges of the act of 1800 to all aliens who shall have, at the date of application, declared their intention to become citizens. The act of 1836 provided for the issuance of patents to persons without reference to citizenship or residence, but provided that if the applicant be a citizen of the United States, or shall have been residing in the United States for one year next preceding, and shall have made oath of his intention to become a citizen, the fee for the issuance of the patent should be $30. If a subject of Great Britain, the fee should be $500, and all other persons the sum of $300, etc. It also provided (section 15) that an alien patentee should put his invention on sale within eighteen months after the granting of the patent.

Our fathers who formulated and adopted the Constitution evidently put the two kinds of property in the same class and gave them the same recognition, the provision for the protection of each being in the same clause of the Constitution. The first act, providing for the issuance of patents for valuable inventions, extended the privilege to citizens of all nations. By the next act the privilege to foreigners was repealed, but it appears that soon thereafter it was restored to foreign citizens, not, however, upon the same terms, the citizens of other nations, except Great Britain, being charged a fee ten times as great as our own citizens, and the citizens of Great Britain seventeen times as great a fee.

This discrimination, however, has long since been withdrawn, and in so far as patents for inventions in the arts are concerned we put the citizens of all nations on an equal footing with our own. This was in the line with much of the legislation of the country, and in keeping with the general progress of international law, and that recognition of comity among nations upon which rests to a large degree that valuable and fructifying international intercourse, the value of which is coming to be recognized by all the great civilized nations of the earth. The United States Government has recognized this principle in its treatment of all international questions save and except this one of international copyright.

There is a difference between a patent and a copyright, inasmuch as the patent protects the author in the exclusive right to the income which may accrue from the development of an idea, while copyright covers clothing ideas with a certain form of language; yet both are based upon the same principle, that the public are benefited by the mental labor which has developed or produced something of value to the community.

It may be said that there is no such thing as absolute property. The ownership of everything is limited by the demands of society. The old principle of the right of discovery is still to some extent acknowledged. In all the jarring theories of the present time in regard to the rights of occupation, of prior discovery, of the prerogative of crowns, or the binding force of government patents to land, all, I believe, admit that if there is any property right which may be said to be sacred it is the right of the individual to the enjoyment of those valuable things which by his own effort of brain or muscle he has himself produced.

There is a marked difference between that character of chattels which the hand of man, aided by the forces of nature, develops and those incorporeal creations which are wrought out by the human intellect. While this property is metaphysical and intangible in its character, lacking the physical characteristics of most things which are produced by man and recognized as property, it is of a nature of more nearly absolute creation than any other species of property recognized by legislation, and as such demands of the conscientious legislator recognition and careful guarding.

I have prepared a brief digest of the provisions in regard to the length of time for which copyright runs in different countries, and I will read it now, because it perhaps may have some bearing upon some other questions that may come up.

The following is a list of the nations who have enacted copyright laws, with the duration of the right:

United States: Twenty-eight years, with privilege of fourteen more to author, widow, or children.

England: Life of author and seven years, or forty-two years.

Canada: Twenty-eight years, with manufacturing condition.

France: Fifty years beyond author's death, with privilege for any foreigner to publish and be protected.

German Empire: Thirty years beyond author's death, with protection to foreign works if published by a firm having its place of business in the German Empire.

Holland and Belgium: Author's life and twenty years, but requires works to be published in those countries.

Norway: Life of author and fifty years.

Spain: Life of author and eighty years.

Portugal: Life of author and thirty years.
Italy: Life of author or forty years, with privilege of a second term, after author's death, of forty years.
Hayti: Life of author, life of widow, children, and twenty years.
Austria-Hungary: Life of author and thirty years.
Sweden: Life of author and fifty years; formerly perpetual.
Denmark: Life of author and thirty years.
Switzerland: Life of author or thirty years.
Russia: Life of author and fifty years.
Turkey: For forty years, or twenty years for translations.
Greece: Fifteen years, subject to royal extension.
Mexico: Perpetual literary copyright.
Venezuela: Life of author and fourteen years.
Chili: Life of author and five years.
Brazil: Life of author and ten years.
Japan: Thirty years, with extension to thirty-five years.

All these nations, then, recognize this as property. We alone of all the great civilized nations of the earth stand by ourselves in the unenviable notoriety of failing or refusing to grant to the citizens of foreign countries that recognition of this partial property right, which has stood the legislative test in all lands for hundreds of years, and the assaults in court and legislative hall of interested parties on every hand, and yet has everywhere shown a steady advance in the recognition of its rights to protection.

We are the Barbary coast of literature, and the American people the buccaneers among books. We alone in all this world are a great nation of thieves, corsairs; and I am indebted to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS] for the word. It is a good word. We are corsairs on the great ocean of literature.

I do not put my appeal alone upon the constitutional ground of the encouragement of science, but upon the higher, nobler, and more ancient law, that "the laborer is worthy of his hire."

It is sometimes denied that prospective copyright encourages the development of that which is highest and best in letters. The growth of that wonderful literature which has kept fresh for more than twenty centuries the Hellenic tongue was, I presume, without any such stimulus. All the great Roman authors, it is said, wrote without it, but how few were the authors in those days and how many are they at the present day, and how little influence had literature towards the preservation of and growth and up-building of their institutions?

Blackstone says:

> That the Roman law adjudged that if a man wrote anything on the paper or parchment of another the writing should belong to the owner of the blank material, but gave no other ownership to the productions of the intellect.

The greatest and most enduring works in the English, French, and German languages were written before the adoption of even the most limited and local statutes to protect the authors who wrote them. But it is to be borne in mind that up to the time of the adoption of the statute of Queen Anne the principle was recognized by the courts of Great Britain that this was a common-law right. Further on I shall allude to that subject again.

I wish in parenthesis to call the attention of my legal friends here to that point. I think it is very material. The change in the position of the English legislature and the enactment of the law in Queen Anne's time were owing to a popular desire that there should be some restraints put upon the royal prerogative of selling all sorts of rights. In order to make some exception they had to pass a copyright law, and the courts of highest resort in Great Britain (I believe it has been confirmed by the House of Lords) have decided that previous to that act it was a common-law right and was perpetual.

In fact the earliest copyright laws seem to have been enacted more for the benefit of publishers than authors. The nature and quality of the author's right, and the reasons for and against its recognition in law, have been hotly contested from the outset. As to whether the right to multiply an author's works rests in the common law or should be treated only as a privilege temporarily vested in the author, we need not discuss; because, whatever may be the case in other countries, we are limited by the express language of the provisions of the Constitution, and under that inhibition we can only legislate for limited times. It is, and must of necessity be, treated in this country as a temporary privilege.

Copyright may not be property in the ordinary sense in which that term is used, although it is in the legal and larger sense; but it is not correct to say that copyright, or a patent, is merely "the right to enjoy or use the products of labor." It is something more than that. The author produces one book. That book is his and his right to it is as indefeasible as that to any other chattel, and the law protects them in it just as it would protect him in the possession of any other piece of property. But as to no other kind of property, except copyright and patents, is there any interdiction against another's producing more of the same kind of things. This is happily illustrated by the example of the pheasants. A man may hatch out pheasants and the law protects him in the possession of them but does not prevent others from hatching them out also. In all kinds of ordinary chattels any person is left free to produce and multiply them at pleasure. The attempt to establish copyright as ordinary property will fail, and it is unworthy the intelligence of some of those who essay it.

The very fact of this protection of this property being limited in duration by nearly all governments everywhere, both republican and monarchical, and such limitation being supported and defended by all statesmen, with scarcely an exception for two hundred and fifty years, is conclusive evidence of so general and long-continued a consensus of opinion that it seems to me altogether futile at this day to set up the other argument. Of all the many nations who have granted copyright only four—Holland, Belgium, Sweden, and Mexico—have ever made it perpetual, and of these all but one have rescinded and limited the time, which shows that there is in the peculiar nature of this property a necessity for its limitation in the course of time. The Republic of Mexico alone still recognizes literary copyright as perpetual.

On the other hand, Blackstone claims that the statute 8 Anne, chapter 19, in 1710 was suggested by the exception in the statute of monopolies, 21 James I, chapter 3, the object of which was to suppress the royal grants of exclusive right to trade in certain articles, and to reassert the common law in relation to such monopolies—

> That this act, or any declaration, provision, disablement, penalty, or other thing before mentioned, shall not extend to any letters patent or grants of privilege heretofore made, or hereafter to be made, of, for, or concerning printing, etc. * * *

But I do not subscribe to the dictum announced by Lord Camden that:

> Glory is the reward of science, and those who deserve it scorn all meaner views.

He said:

> I speak not of the scribblers for bread who tease the press with their wretched productions.

Fourteen years are too long a period for their perishable trash. It was not for gain that Bacon, Newton, and Locke instructed and delighted the world. When the bookseller offered Milton five pounds for Paradise Lost he did not reject it and commit his poem to the flames, nor did he accept the miserable pittance as the reward of his labor; he knew that the real price of his work was immortality, and that posterity would pay it.

It is a special kind of property. But that property which rests upon the fact that the thing possessed is the product of the proprietor's own labor must be admitted to rest upon the strongest claim. In the case of book making or publishing there enters another element of material interest and effect upon us as legislators.

The author must publish his work. His remuneration is another and separate thing from the profits of publishing. By granting international copyright we recognize and protect his income; but to superadd to that the demand that the foreign publisher shall be granted the monopoly of our market is, to my mind, an unparalleled demand, to which we have no right to give our assent. If we give to the foreign author the same rights which we give to our own, how can he claim any more?

By the law of all nations the author's rights are the same. He owns absolutely the copy original as long as it remains unpublished. That right is recognized as perpetual. It is only when he publishes it that he crosses the line of his common-law right. By the law of all nations the prescriptive right of the author to publish a book is contingent upon his asking to have it protected. So incorporeal and imperfect is this right in its characteristics that of necessity it must be treated in a different manner from ordinary chattels. The question should be dealt with, however, in a broad and liberal spirit, with candor and careful inquiry to search out and guard every interest which rightfully claims our protection, free as far as possible from bias toward the interests of any particular class. In pursuance therewith the committee have, as they believe, succeeded in drawing a bill to cover and protect carefully the rights and interests of all parties directly interested in the enactment of such a law.

Now I wish to address myself briefly to the question raised by the Senator from New York [Mr. HISCOCK]. Very naturally he addresses himself to this phase of the subject, the question of protection in the ordinary sense of that term, in other words, of a tariff upon imports. Whether it is a question of protection or free trade, of the right to bring into this country merchandise, I apprehend if Senators will look at it with very little care they will see that it is in no sense a question of protection or free trade. As I remarked a few days ago when introducing this bill, the duties upon the importation of goods may be doubled or quadrupled, they may be indefinitely increased or entirely removed, without in any sense seriously affecting the operation of this proposed law. Whether this proposed law be enacted or not, it will not have any influence upon the tariff or upon the protection of American industries. The Government in no sense gets any income from this source. It is simply a question of the acknowledgment and protection of the right of a foreign author in exactly the same manner as we protect the rights of a domestic author, simply whether we will remove from ourselves the stain of standing alone amongst all the nations of the earth as pirates in literature. That is it, and that alone is it. It is nothing else.

There are other questions which arise in connection with this matter very naturally, which have been frequently put to me. People say it will make books more expensive. Very well. The first answer is, suppose it does? If it is right, that makes no difference. Some people might say it was cheaper to steal any kind of chattels. I apprehend, however, that in the long run we as a people shall find that is a mistake. Evil brings its own penalty inevitably. The individual or the nation that persists in any evil course, theft or other, inevitably meets the punishment of wrong-doing sooner or later, and the longer it is put off the greater the penalty, and we in this country are not exempt from that penalty in regard to our literature.

What is the fact? The people of the United States at the present time are debarred from participating in the best foreign literature. We are flooded, it is true, with a host of immoral and bad publications. Like the weeds in the garden, they grow readily without cultivation, while the seed or plant that bears good fruit both in the garden and in the field of literature needs water and attention and careful nurture.

Such is the fruit. Anybody may see the result by an examination of the titles of foreign books which are flooding the country at the present day—immoral novels of the worst nature scattered all over the land. But if you look through your book-shelves you will find the best works of English authors, of French and German authors, are very scarce, and why? I will explain to the Senate why it is.

To publish a book at the present day is a very different matter from what it was, comparatively speaking, a few years ago. The public demands that the book shall be put upon the market at a cheap rate. In order to do that the ground must be laid out carefully. The expenses of the publishing office, clerical expenses, stereotyping, and the amount of money that has to be paid out in what may be termed the plant in order to get out a single book amounts to what a few years ago would have been a small fortune. Added to that it is necessary to expend a very large sum of money to advertise every book which is brought before the public. Suppose the publisher when he has put all this capital into this plant and this advertising is not protected by a copyright; suppose he puts his book on the market at a dollar a volume; some man, seeing he has advertised that book and drawn the attention of the public to it, prints it on poorer paper, with meaner type, with narrower margin, and takes advantage of his advertisement and sells it at 75 cents a volume? The other publisher has the loss of the capital he invested in the enterprise. Consequently publishers hesitate and often do not do it, and the American public are debarred the privilege of getting good English books at a cheap price. Go wherever you will, search the shelves of the book-sellers, and if you find them at all you find foreign editions at very low prices. Hence the common apprehension that the enactment of this law is going to make the cost of foreign literature dearer, higher to the American reader, I apprehend, is a mistake. On the contrary, let us see how it will operate.

The foreign author may come here and take out his copyright. By the provisions of this bill in order to take out the copyright his work must be published simultaneously in the two countries. It must be published here from type set in this country. Therefore the foreign author who copyrights a book here must arrange with some American publisher. The American publisher in order to meet the market knows full well that he must prepare himself to offer that book at a price which will compete with the price at which our best American books are offered, and therefore he will offer the foreign book at a low price. It seems so me that if I am correct in the position—and I believe I am, I believe it is unassailable—then it is clear that the effect of this law will be, instead of making foreign literature dearer to the American people, to make it cheaper.

There are one or two other matters to which I will allude at the present time to which, no doubt, Senators have had their attention drawn. There are published in this country, I believe, two magazines that are in the nature of what are called eclectic magazines. I know of only two. Their circulation many years ago was very considerable. They have from year to year been gradually diminishing, and they are now, in comparison with the great magazines published in this country, very inconsiderable.

Those magazines are made up by copying articles from foreign publications. They have been, as I understand, published without paying the authors of the foreign articles any consideration for their work. They are what are termed—and I do not use the term now in an offensive sense—pirated works. That is a technical term to designate works that are printed without paying the writer anything for his article or book. Those magazines have gained a place with many readers, and some feel a very warm regard for them. For my own part I have a very considerable sympathy with the publishers of those magazines.

It has been urged that the enactment of this law will interfere with their "rights." I put the word in quotation—"rights"—and the stenographer will see that it is done. These gentlemen have no rights in the premises, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] adds, that white men are bound to respect. The principle should be as broad as the world, and if it is right to protect the author of a book, it is right to protect the author of a magazine article. And I wish to say that two or three circuit courts of the United States, and I think Judge Curtis was one, have decided that the law does not contemplate that a book must be bound, that it may be a printed article upon a single sheet of paper and is entitled to the protection of the legislature.

Mr. PLATT. May I ask the Senator from Rhode Island a question?

Mr. CHACE. With pleasure.

Mr. PLATT. I suppose he refers to Littell's Living Age?

Mr. CHACE. I do, and to the Eclectic.

Mr. PLATT. Those magazines are made up by reprinting articles from foreign periodicals.

Mr. CHACE. They are.

Mr. PLATT. How will the publishers of those magazines be interfered with?

Mr. CHACE. I was coming to that a little further on. I always dislike to argue such a question as this upon the lower ground. I should have to bring it in after awhile, but I should like to have this law enacted, if it is enacted at all, upon the broad and high principle that it is right, that it is only doing justice between man and man, that the principle of justice does not stop at State lines, that we do not propose that our law shall fail to protect this class of property while it protects every other class of property; nor are we going to take the ground that the man who has attained a position before the public, who has become known so that people buy and read his books, shall be protected and cared for, and the young author who forsooth can only get the ear of the public through a magazine shall not be protected by the law. The humblest citizen who seeks redress before the courts ought to be protected as well as the richest. I believe, in regard to this matter as well as in regard to everything else, that the glory of our civilization is that every man can get justice, no matter how small his claim, before any court anywhere in the land, and that principle ought to apply to this question.

But for the relief of gentlemen who do not see this matter as I do I wish to call attention to the fact that by the necessities of the case we are obliged to provide in this law that any foreign author in order to get a copyright in this country must publish his work simultaneously in this country and abroad. These foreign magazines will hardly attempt to do that. There are many and cogent reasons why they will not. In the first place, the character of the English and German magazines is not such as would render them adapted to the general reading public here. It is only occasionally that an article from them is sought to be published here, and they must perforce change the whole character, not only of the publication itself, but of the methods and means and mechanical appliances; they must come here; they must transplant themselves to this country. They can not do it, and they will not do it. There is no room for the great English quarterlies or the great English monthly magazines in this country. The field has been fully occupied by the most magnificent series of magazine publications that the world ever saw. On the contrary, our magazine publishers are filling not only our own market fully but are invading Great Britain.

The splendid Century Magazine, unexcelled in its letterpress and in the quality of its paper, and I might say almost unequaled in its illustrations, publishes some 200,000 copies and circulates them every month in this country, and from thirty-five to fifty thousand every month in Great Britain. That will never be accomplished by any foreign magazine in this country, in my judgment, at least not for long years to come, so that these eclectics will still have the field left open to them.

The subject is so well, forcibly, and succinctly discussed by H. C. Lea in his statement to the Senate Committee on Patents that I will incorporate a part of what he says in my remarks. A scholar and an author of high repute, having been for fifty years engaged in the business of publishing books, with eminent business success, but now retired, no man in the country is better qualified than he to speak on this subject. Being now a comparatively disinterested party, his great attainments and wide experience enable him to view the subject in all its phases in an impartial manner. Enjoying a well-earned competence he is still alive to the interests of all classes whose efforts, whether intellectual or manual, go to the making up of a book. He says:

> I trust that by this time every one will admit that the existing state of American law inflicts injustice on literary men on both sides of the Atlantic. The foreign author is deprived of his just dues when his works are reproduced in this country without his permission and without payment, and though it is the custom of all reputable American houses to compensate the writers whose works they reprint, still the absence of all legal rights necessarily limits such payments. The American author is subjected to an unfair and unnatural competition with the unprotected labor of the foreigner. His markets are limited by the excessive sales of works written abroad and made here at the lowest possible cost, and the prices at which his books can be sold, and his consequent remuneration, are reduced below what they would be in the absence of such competition.
> * * * Society recognizes no absolute and unlimited ownership in any species of property. All that the individual makes, earns, or inherits is held under such limitations as society sees fit to impose in return for the protection which is afforded by the social compact and the value which is imparted to ownership by the aggregation of individuals in communities.
> This limitation of ownership is especially applicable to so purely an artificial creation as copyright. I have alluded to the author in his commercial capacity as a seller of words, and such, under the legal construction of copyright, he simply is.
> There is no copyright in ideas, but only in the form in which they are clothed. The man of science, the philosopher, the historian, the investigator in any branch of human knowledge, may spend a lifetime in discovering principles which may profoundly affect the moral and material well-being of the race, or in discovering facts of the highest interest to the progress of mankind, and as soon as he divulges them to the world they become the common property of his fellow men. Any author may at once seize upon them and embody them in his essay or his text-book, without even an acknowledgment to the laborious originator or discoverer, and can then claim a copyright upon the dress in which he has clothed his borrowed ideas.

The wisdom of society has decided that it is conducive to the progress and welfare of mankind that in books the verbal expression alone shall be the subject of monopoly and ownership, while the ideas shall be free to all, rewarding the inventor and discoverer, the thinker and investigator, with only the barren tribute of fame or the consciousness of service rendered to his fellow creatures, while it stimulates the compiler and the literary man with a certain limited monopoly in selling the form in which he may clothe ideas, whether original or borrowed. In the cognate subject of patents, the wisdom of society has arrived at a conclusion almost directly opposite.

There the monopoly has been bestowed on the idea as an incentive to inventiveness, and the material form in which the idea is clothed is regarded as indifferent. If a patentee makes a machine in one style it can not be reproduced in another, or even improved, if the patented principle is retained. The subject of the patent is the idea, the subject of the copyright is the form.

Thus, by common consent, literary property, the creation of law, is peculiarly subject to the limitations which society may see fit to define for its own protection or advantage when asked to grant and enforce a monopoly. No natural exclusive rights ever have been or can be recognized, and it becomes simply a matter of expediency what conditions shall be imposed when the benefit of monopoly, heretofore restricted to our citizens, is proposed to be extended to foreigners. * * *

I will quote again from Henry C. Lea:

There is another class of the population whose claims to be recognized in this legislation can not be ignored. The book business in this country gives support to many thousands of industrious people of both sexes. There are few products in which labor forms so overwhelmingly large a percentage of the value as in books. The raw material of the most finished volume is a few rags or a billet of wood, a little lamp-black and oil, and a handful of cotton fiber.

The rest is labor, partly unskilled, but mostly skilled and requiring long apprenticeship. In every paper mill, printing office, and bindery in the United States the effect of this legislation will be felt. If it is so framed as to lead our markets to draw their supplies from abroad, diminished work must throw numbers out of employment, while those who are retained must be content with lower wages. In considering the expediency of the conditions to be imposed on foreign authors admitted to the benefit of American copyright, this is a consideration which legislators can not overlook.

Its neglect would, indeed, be suicidal, as there would be an additional and most powerful element of discontent created for the speedy overthrow of improvident and one-sided legislation. I am sure that what every one wants is that this question shall be settled with such wise and equitable adjustment of all contending claims that each shall be measurably satisfied, and that the present decision shall be a finality.

Were we to adopt a plan by which every foreign author or publisher could, if he chose, become possessed of an absolute monopoly of our market for his book, by registering and paying a fee of $1, he might refuse either to publish or sell here, and thus we would have cut ourselves off entirely. You may say that is not likely; but why should we expose ourselves to the chance of such a contingency? What would happen would be that the author, more particularly those in England, would arrrange with his home publisher, and the American reader would be obliged to pay whatever price he saw fit to fix upon the work. The customary high English prices would be demanded of our readers, and our aritsans and laborers would be deprived of the income which I hold it is the duty of Congress to secure to them.

The committee, feeling themselves charged with the duty of listening to all classes, and of endeavoring to care for and foster all, the poor as well as the rich, the man who works with his hands as well as the intellectual toiler, or the merchant in his counting-house, have endeavored to frame a bill which would give protection to all these. These are all laborers, and have an equal claim upon the fostering care of the Government, toward the support of which each contributes his share.

Existing statutes require American authors to publish here and give the book-makers an opportunity to secure their portion of the fruits of the enterprise. We should not require less of a foreigner to whom we grant this special privilege. The Constitution provides that authors may for a limited time be secured the exclusive right to their respective writings. We recognize thus far the exclusive rights of authors to their writings. The purpose of this bill is to extend that recognition to citizens and residents of foreign countries.

There are two great reasons which should move us thereunto. First, and of the least weight, is the expectation that our own writers will reap a compensation from the reciprocal protection which they will receive. This is not large; but the great, and to my mind, the controlling reason is, that common equity and that comity which ought to exist between nations demand it at our hands. Copyright for a limited time is recognized as a privilege belonging to the writer of a book by every civilized nation in the world. All the great nations have international patent laws, including ourselves. The foreign inventor can secure a patent here.

We permit aliens to hold and transmit property of every nature except copyright. Having demonstrated for ourselves, in a manner as I believe should be convincing to others, that this is in the nature of property which is recognized by all civilized nations; proclaiming, as we do, ourselves a Christian nation, bound by the obligations of right, justice, equity, good neighborhood, and the ordinary comity which does and of right ought to exist between nations, are we not bound to extend that recognition to the foreign author? We proclaim ourselves not only the greatest, the richest, but the most liberal nation on the face of the globe. We boast of our honor and our integrity. "Probitas laudatur et alget."

Shall we longer stand in this humiliating position? What are the compensations which the public may expect from the enactment of a law, leaving out of view for the present the ethical side of the question? Are the public real gainers by the present policy? I believe not. They have been served by the Monroe, Lovells, the Seaside, the Franklin Square, and other publishers of certain works of foreign authors at a very low price. But it is by no means certain that the reading public will not be nearly as cheaply served by the passage of such a bill as this. The small amount of royalty which would go to the author, usually 10 per cent. or less, is not a material addition to the cost of a 25-cent book—2½ cents. But it is to higher considerations that I appeal.

Shall we continue to permit this stain to rest upon our good name? Such a law has met the approval of statesmen of all parties. The most eminent men on both sides of this Senate are on record in favor of some form of international copyright. A committee consisting of such great men as Webster, Clay, Buchanan, Preston, and Ewing, reported favorably to the Senate a bill for this purpose.

All international law is based, like the domestic enactments of nations themselves, upon the common principles of natural justice and right reason, to which all organized society must acknowledge its allegiance. I have little respect for that man calling himself a statesman who, in this age of the world, is willing to proclaim by his voice or his vote that he is unwilling to recognize the property rights of any character of citizens of foreign lands.

Such negation of the rights of others deserves to be ranked with the ancient, and now odious, droit d'aubaine. It is worse than the old feudal practice of four hundred years ago, called the "right of detraction," under which the sovereign and his feudatory took only part of the inheritance left by strangers and magnanimously gave the heirs the rest. In England, in the time of Henry II, every alien was made responsible for the debts of every other alien, and not until 1870 could an alien inherit property there. The property of dead aliens "escheated" to the crown. Our failure to legislate in this matter is worse—it is "cheating."

At the recent international copyright congress, held at Berne, Switzerland, all the civilized nations recognized this international right. We alone excepted this among "the sacred and inalienable rights of humanity." We stand disgraced before the world. We, the richest of the nations, appropriating, because we can, the fruits of others' labor. Demosthenes said:

We are justly more exasperated against those who, abounding in riches, commit evil actions, than against those who impelled by want do the same. Humane judges are always ready to make allowance for necessity, but when wealth is united with injustice no pretext can be pleaded in excuse.

Let whoever thinks we gain give his voice against this righteous act. I believe, and will maintain, that "whatever is just is advantageous."

Woolsey says:

Inasmuch as rights and obligations are correlative, there is an obligation lying on every State to respect the rights of every other, to abstain from all injury and wrong towards it, as well as towards its subjects.

That is the jus naturæ—the great law of nature which is perpetual and irrevocable.

Agriculture has been called the imperial industry, but I hold that literature is the foundation of all prosperity, of all progress, of all civilization. Neither church nor state can thrive without it. Printing has been termed the art preservative of arts; but without literature there would be no printing—there could be no arts. The foundation of civilization itself rests upon literature.

The growth of all nations depends upon their literature. The wonderful success of the colonies in this country, and of the Union afterwards, was, in my apprehension, due to the fact that the men who first came to this country were largely men of letters.

Had they not drunk deeply at the fountain of learning they never could have elaborated that wonderful state polity, the final fruition of which was our wonderful Constitution and compact of Union and the constellation of States, each with its own polity, tending to promote the arts, sciences, and literature and to conserve the liberties of the people. Thus are we deeply indebted to the author, the poorest paid of all laborers; he who labors while others sleep. The protection of their toil is only for a brief season, while generations often enter into the fruits of their labors. Shall we not cease to discriminate, but let him, like other citizens, feel that when he goes abroad the flag of the nation is the emblem of the protection of his rights also, as it is of every other citizen?

We negotiate with other governments for the mutual extradition of a thief who steals pelf; shall we not receive from them the extended hand offered to join us in mutual protection to the most useful of all classes of citizens? Shall we not take this step which will bring as its fruits large additions to the general welfare, the progress of mankind, and most useful and beneficent results to every industry? Shall literature, which was the foundation of our modern civilization, be left an outcast, relegated to the dark ages? The avenues of trade, commerce, agriculture, and manufactures offer inducements of money value as well as of the plaudits of success.

Why should we not open as wide a field to the writer of books? He ministers to our pleasure; he adds to our learning; he fosters the arts; he teaches the farmer improved methods; he develops the sciences; he reforms the minds and incites the youths to noble lives; he defends our institutions and our religion; why is he alone unworthy of our just consideration?

I appeal to you my countrymen, fellow-Senators, to join in this tardy act of justice. Let the American Senate no longer by its action cause honest Americans to hang their heads in shame for our failure to join the other civilized nations of the earth in an act of plain and simple justice.

[House Miscellaneous No. 76, Thirtieth Congress, first session.]

International copyright—Memorials of John Jay and William C. Bryant and others in favor of an international copyright law.

March 22, 1848.—Referred to a select committee.
April 29, 1848.—Ordered to be printed.

To the honorable the Senate and the House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

The memorial of the undersigned, a citizen of the State of New York, respectfully asks the attention of your honorable bodies to the insufficient protection afforded to American literature by the present law of Congress on the subject of copyright.

Your memorialist, from a careful examination of the subject, is well persuaded that many injuries, direct and remote, are inflicted by the exclusion of foreigners from the privileges of that act, upon the rights of American authors, upon the stability and respectability of the American book trade, and upon the interests of the American reading public; and that the passage of an international copyright law, by which foreign authors shall be allowed their copyright here, and American authors assisted to their copyright abroad, would not only be an act of national justice, but of national policy; that it would afford to our native authors what they have never yet enjoyed, "a fair field;" that it would supply a new stimulus to intellectual exertion, infuse a more elevated tone into our national literature, give a healthier character and a wider competition to the American book trade, and secure a better class of books for general circulation.

In support of these views, your memorialist prays leave to submit to your honorable bodies a few arguments and facts.

That the restriction of the privileges of copyright to American authors may have been intended for their advantage is highly probable; but its full operation, until within a few years, has been very imperfectly understood, and has never been brought to the attention of Congress.

The Committee on the Judiciary in the House of Representatives (December 17, 1830), who reported the present copyright act, after drawing a comparison between the legislation of this country for the protection of literature, and that of England, France, Russia, Norway, and Sweden, and declaring that the comparison showed that the United States were far behind the states of Europe in securing the fruits of intellectual labor, and in encouraging men of letters, thus warmly expressed themselves in regard to the rights and claims of authors:

"Your committee believe that the just claims of authors require from our legislation a protection not less than what is proposed in the bill reported. Upon the first principles of proprietorship in property, an author has an exclusive and perpetual right, in preference to any other, to the fruits of his labors. Though the nature of literary property is peculiar, it is not the less real and valuable. If labor and effort in producing what before was not possessed or known will give title, then the literary man has title perfect and absolute, and should have his reward; he writes and he labors as assiduously as does the mechanic or husbandman. The scholar who secludes himself and wastes his life, and often his property, to enlighten the world, has the best right to the profits of those labors. The planter, the mechanic, the professional man, can not prefer a better title to what is admitted to be his own. Nor is there any doubt what the interest and honor of the country demand on this subject. * * * We ought to present every reasonable inducement to influence men to consecrate their talents to the advancement of science. It can not be for the interest and honor of our country that intellectual labor should be depreciated, and a life devoted to research and laborious study terminate in disappointment and poverty."

No constitutional objection to the extension of copyright to foreigners existed to influence the committee in their restriction of that right to American writers, for the Constitution authorizes Congress "to promote the progress of science and useful arts by securing for limited times to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries." There is no limitation of the power to natives or residents of this country. The object was to promote the progress of "science and useful arts," which have been well said to belong to no party or country, but to mankind generally. And Congress has already adopted the principle in the laws regulating patents by extending their benefits to foreign inventions and improvements.

It seems, therefore, evident that the Congress by which the present amended copyright act was passed were not aware of the many injuries growing out of the exclusive system which they recognized and re-established, to the very parties whom it was intended and expected to benefit. These injuries may be thus stated:

I.—INJURY TO AMERICAN AUTHORS.

1. In regard to the sale of their books at home.—The present act, while intended to protect American authors in the full enjoyment of their work by giving them an exclusive right to their disposition for a long term of years, at the same time introduces an unfair and ruinous competition by allowing them to be undersold by American book-sellers, selecting and appropriating at their will the unprotected productions of the British press, multiplied editions of which naturally crowd out of the market works of American origin which are subject to copyright. In general, too, the popularity of the British works thus reprinted is a thing established, while that of the unpublished manuscript of the American author is still uncertain.

It is evident, then, that the position in which our native authors are thus placed is discouraging in the extreme; that a fair opportunity of success is denied them; and that this position is not the result of any inferiority in their productions, nor of any reluctance on the part of the liberal American publishers to aid American literature, but that it is the direct and inevitable consequence of the present law, which creates an unfair and overwhelming competition by the admission of unbought foreign literature.

That the infant literature of our young land has struggled successfully even with these obstacles, and that a few of our countrymen have achieved both fame and wealth by their writings, is very true; but it is also true that some, whose early literary productions were marked by great excellence and great promise, have been forced to relinquish the profession of letters for other pursuits more likely to yield them a support; and it is equally true that many American authors, whose writings have delighted and instructed both the Old and the New World, instead of enjoying from their works a comfortable independence, and being enabled to devote themselves, untrammeled by other cares, to their honorable and elevating task, derive with difficulty slender subsistence from the price received for the copyright of works which have, in some instances, realized fortunes to English publishers.

2. In regard to the sale of their books abroad.—By act of the British Parliament, 1st and 2d Vict., chap. 59, for securing to authors, in certain cases, the benefit of international copyright, provision is made for affording protection within Great Britain to the authors of books first published in foreign countries, and their assigns, in cases where protection shall be afforded in such foreign countries to the authors of books first published in Great Britain; but in the absence of such protection here to foreign authors, it is denied in Great Britain to American authors, and the denial of this protection is to them a serious injury. The extent to which American books are reprinted and sold in England is probably little known in this country. In the "Report of the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office," adverse to an international copyright law, in the Senate of the United States (Twenty-fifth Congress, second session, No. 491, June 23, 1838, less than ten years since, after referring to the advantages which such a bill would give to an English author here, the report proceeded:

"It may be asked if we should not have an offset in similar advantages under the copyright law of Great Britain. The answer is found in the significant inquiry of the British reviewer, 'Who reads an American book?' The difficulty and expense of bringing an American work into notice with the British public are entirely insurmountable by American authors generally. It is stated in a recent publication that 250 copies of Marshall's Life of Washington, revised and condensed some six years since by the author, were sent to England by one of our publishing houses, whose bookselling connections there were extensive, and offered to the trade at about one-fourth of the price of the first editions. The books remained in London two years, and fifty copies only were sold, on a long credit. The remaining two hundred copies were sent back, saddled with heavy expenses. This is a single instance from many, illustrating how little demand there is in England for American literature."

To exhibit, by positive proof, the singular incorrectness of this statement, your memorialist has hereto appended a list (Appendix B) of upwards of five hundred American works reprinted in England by English publishers, which have been selected from a catalogue of English books, in which they appeared with nothing to designate their American origin. *

Incomplete as this list probably is, from the impossibility of always recognizing American works under the new titles with which they are often reprinted, and imperfect as is the view it presents of American literature in England, for the reason that it frequently designates but one edition and one publisher—whereas, in many cases, numerous editions have been put forth by various publishers; and inasmuch, also, as of late years a large number of American books have been exported to England and there sold through an American agency at London, of which no note is here taken—it will yet suffice to give some idea of the extent to which our own authors are losers by being deprived of a copyright in Great Britain.

The North American Review, after noticing the common impression that the benefits of an international copyright would be, with an immense preponderance, on the side of English authors, and that those of America are too few and the works too little relished in England to be of much importance in the comparison, remarks: †

"No opinion can be more erroneous. Since the Edinburgh Review asked, some twenty-five years ago, 'Who reads an American book?' the tables have been turning exceedingly fast. They are turning at this moment faster than ever: and it is the opinion of as impartial and competent judges as any to be found, that in half as much more time an international copyright law will be decidedly of more value to American authors than to British. A very large part of the transactions of the book trade in both countries is in books for children's reading, and for their use in school education; and in both of these departments—in the latter, from the most elementary to the most elaborate treatises—American works (generally, but not always, under some thin disguise) are fast driving the English out of their market. Dr. Anthon's series of school classics * * * they find much better than any to which they have hitherto been used: and from Peter Parley and the Abbott books up to Leverett's Latin Lexicon and the Cambridge Mathematics, the ingenuous youth of the fast-anchored isle are enjoying luxuries in the way of instruction hitherto all unknown. In law, the treatises of the American Judge Story are regarded by the profession in England as the most important productions of the day. And in the department of theology, the superior estimation in which the writings of American divines are held in the parent country, from sermons to the various kinds of composition of a more scientific character, may, we hesitate not to say, be regarded as an equally established fact. The most popular essays of the age in the English language are, without question, those of Dr. Channing; the most important books of travels are the recent ones of Professor Robinson and Mr. Stephens; the most successful history is that of Mr. Prescott. The writings of Irving and Cooper take rank in England with those of its own eminent authors in the same walks; and some even of our recent poets—the hardest case of all that enter into the comparison—are read almost as much as any native bards. This is but the beginning of a movement altogether unanticipated a few years ago. Such things do not go backward

In Weily & Putnam's "American Book Circular," April, 1843, page 3, is the following passage on the acknowledged excellence of many American books: "We have also good English authority for the opinion that the Hebrew Grammar, by Nordheimer; the Hebrew English Lexicon, by Robinson; the Greek Lexicon to New Testament, by the same; the Commentary on Isaiah, by Barnes; System of Theology, by Dwight; Geography of Palestine, by Robinson; Text-Book, edition of Horace, etc., by Anthon; Modern Contribution to Spanish History (Ferdinand, etc.), by Prescott; Medical Jurisprudence, by Dr. Beck; Medical Jurisprudence of Insanity, by Dr. Ray; Dictionary of the English Language, (!!!) by Dr. Webster, are all the best works, in their several departments, existing in the language."

But American authors are not only deprived of a fair market at home, and of all share in the profits of their works abroad; but

3. They are deprived of all protection in regard to their literary fame and the integrity of their works in foreign countries. English publishers frequently abridge, mutilate, and adapt American works to suit their purposes in the same manner that American publishers often treat English books; and they occasionally change the titles, and omit the author's name.

Mr. Putnam says, in his Book Circular, upon this subject: "Some few American writers would scarcely recognize their own offspring under their new names and foreign dress; and authors are apt to take some pride in their bantlings, whether clever or otherwise. Who, in looking over a list of titles would suppose that 'Quebec and New York, or the Three Beauties,' was the same as 'Burton, or the Sieges;' and 'Cortes, or the Fall of Mexico,' a reprint of 'The Infidel;' that 'The Last Days of Aurelian' is no other than Mr. Ware's 'Probus, or Rome in the Third Century;' and 'Montaeute,' only a new title for 'A New Home;' that Mr. Muzzy's 'Young Maiden' and 'Young Wife,' are translated into the 'English Maiden' and the 'English Wife;' and Mr. Sparks's 'Life of Ledyard, the American Traveler,' is only made more attractive as 'The Memoirs of Ledyard, the African Traveler' (anon); and two volumes of his 'Writings of Washington,' in twelve volumes, are reprinted with the original title, and apparently as if complete. Dr. Harris's 'Natural History of the Bible,' Bancroft's translation of 'Herreus's Politics of Greece,' Mr. Everitt's translation of 'Buttman's Greek Grammar,' were all reprinted and sold as English books: Judge Story's 'Law of Bailments' was chopped into fragments, and appended here and there, by Mr. Theobald, in his Notes on Sir William Jones. These are a few specimens; in most of them the preface, etc., is sufficiently altered to conceal their origin, and in several the author's name is entirely suppressed." (Page 6.)

II.—INJURIES TO AMERICAN PUBLISHERS AND THE NUMEROUS ARTISANS CONNECTED WITH THE BOOK TRADE.

The present system is unfavorable to American publishers and the workmen in their employ, by rendering the business of reprinting speculative and unsafe.

When a publisher has purchased the entire copyright of a work, or the right to print the same for so many years or to the extent of a given number of copies, he has only to calculate, as accurately as may be, what will be the demand, and determine the supply and the price accordingly. The materials for safe and prudent calculation are within his own grasp, and publishers of small means can enter into competition with publishers of large means in bidding for copyrights. But in the case of reprints, under the present system, the publisher who reprints a foreign work can not in advance form certain calculations as to the result of the enterprise. The work being open to all, other publishers may be printing it at the same time; and the more popular the work, the more numerous the editions; so that neither in regard to the required supply, nor the reasonableness of the price, nor the extent of the sales, can he form any estimate with probable certainty. The publication of books under such circumstances becomes a mere speculation, where the risk of loss counterbalances the chance of profit, and which prudent and cautious publishers are apt to shun, as opposed to safe and correct principles of business, and from which men of small capital are driven by the fear of being ruined.

The natural results of such a state of things are unfavorable to the numerous classes engaged in the book trade. The business of reprinting the new and popular books that issue from the English press is to a great extent monopolized by a few large houses, whose wealth and power enable them to crush competition; and this monopoly, if profitable to the few, is injurious to the many.

There is frequently, too, a waste of capital in the multiplied editions of the same book; capital which would otherwise be profitably employed in the production of different works; and the risk attending this business, when it does eventuate in loss, is apt to affect not only individual publishers, but the numbers engaged in their employ, and whose remuneration depends upon their success.

It has been supposed by many that an international copyright law, if of advantage to authors, must be detrimental to publishers; but such an opinion has been based upon a narrow view of the subject, and has been rejected by a large number of printers, publishers, booksellers, and bookbinders throughout the country, as your honorable bodies may see from various petitions heretofore presented to Congress, one of which, from persons concerned in the book trade in New York, Boston, Hartford, New Haven, Philadelphia, Charleston, and other cities, is hereto appended (Appendix A), in which the memorialists declare their opinion that "the interests of the authors, the publishers, and the purchasers, are reciprocal, as those of the producer and consumer always are."

III.—DISADVANTAGES TO THE READING PUBLIC AND THE NATION AT LARGE.

Besides the disadvantages which this reciprocity of interest between authors, publishers, and readers naturally entails upon the latter, by aught which deranges the regularity or impairs the prosperity of the book trade, and the direct inconvenience to which they are often subjected from the slovenly editions of some books put forth in haste from fear of competition, and the loss, far more important, of others from the same motive, the present system has strongly tended to lower the standard of taste, feeling, and principle amongst us, by flooding the land with reprints and translations of light, ephemeral, and often an immoral cast, whose influence upon the minds of American youth is little calculated to encourage patriotic sentiments or Christian principles, or to fit them for the practical duties of American citizens.

Those works which add to a country's glory, and secure true fame for their authors, generally require great learning, great industry, and sometimes large capital, in their preparation. For such works by American writers no encouragement is held forth by a system which favors the introduction from abroad of foreign books, whose tone is characterized by "that ensnaring 'meretricious popularness' in literature which threatens to break up and scatter before it (with those subjected to influence) all robustness and manly vigor of intellect, and all masculine fortitude of virtue." A principal intent of the copyright act beyond what is required by the principles of natural justice and equity, is that the security afforded to authors "may encourage men of learning and genius to publish their writings which may do honor to their country and service to mankind."* But in its practical operation a great temptation is afforded to our native authors to overcome, if possible, the competition of unbought foreign reprints, by producing works suited to the artificial demand they have created, and calculated to gratify the feverish and unhealthy taste engendered by the perusal of transatlantic novels, rather than to reform so morbid an appetite by supplying books of real value, teaching republican principles and inculcating American feelings.

This view of the case, in the opinion of your memorialist, forcibly addresses itself to the consideration of all who are friendly to an elevated American policy. "A vigorous literature is always the congenial growth of a native soil, and an able work in almost any department will have its train of thought in some measure tinged by the character of the institutions under which its author has been reared, and will of course exert, however insensibly, some degree of corresponding influence upon the reader's mind." Native writers have been, with reason, said to be as indispensable as a native militia. To them must we look for the dissemination, the exposition, and the maintenance of our country's principles and institutions, which, with her rapidly increasing power and extent, are daily becoming more and more the objects of jealousy and misrepresentation in foreign lands, whose imported literature, breathing another spirit than our own, now displaces that which springs from American soil, and which would, if duly cherished, or if only allowed fair opportunity for growth, prove the true-hearted guardian and ever-eloquent maintainer of American institutions. Under monarchial governments it may be a matter of comparatively little importance whether the mass of the people are carefully informed and rightly appreciate the principles of their foundation. But in our land, whose institutions are based upon the capacity and integrity of the people, and can only retain their stability while maintained by their honesty and intelligence, we are forced to recognize the importance of a literature based upon popular principles and adapted to the genius of our Government.†

OBJECTIONS WHICH HAVE BEEN URGED AGAINST AN INTERNATIONAL COPYRIGHT LAW.

First objection. That it would transfer the manufacture of books for the American market from this country to England: In the adverse report of the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office already referred to, made to the Senate of the United States on the 25th June, 1838, the number of persons employed in the various branches connected with book-making and periodical publication in this country was estimated at two hundred thousand, and the capital employed in those branches at from thirty to forty millions of dollars; and it was argued that this large class would be seriously affected by the proposed measure, "in its inevitable tendency to divert labor and capital from their accustomed channels, and to derange an extensive and valuable business which it should be the cherished policy of the Government to foster and protect;" that it would materially lessen an important manufacture, and take employment from our own citizens and transfer it to foreigners, to the great discouragement of American industry; that "a valuable portion of the book-making business, with the extensive employment and manufactures connected with it, will inevitably be transferred from our own country to Europe." That large editions of books can be printed at a much less average cost than small editions; and that when we take into consideration the great abundance of capital and the cheapness of labor in England, it could not be doubted that the printing of foreign books for the American market would, to a great extent, be engrossed by foreign publishers, especially as the power and controlling influence of the great publishing houses in London over the literary market in that country would secure to them a monopoly also of American copyright for the writings of British authors;" and the committee concluded by regarding it as perfectly clear that by the enactment of an international copyright "the profits of trade and manufacture, and all the benefits arising from encouragement to national industry, would be for us on the wrong side of the ledger."

The whole force of this objection rests in the supposition that an international copyright for the protection of authors and the encouragement of a national literature would allow British publishers to secure a copyright in this country for English editions, and supply the American public with imported books, to the great detriment of the American book trade.

No such necessity exists, and no such privilege for foreign publishers could be desired by any American friendly to the encouragement of native industry. All that is asked is protection for the rights of authors; and that protection may be given both at home and abroad by an international copyright, coupled with the conditions, as regards foreign books, that "the type, ink, and paper shall be made, and the printing and binding done, in American workshops."

And then the new impulse thus given to American authorship, the increased stability and prosperity thus added to the business of American publishers, so far from operating injuriously upon our type-founders, paper-makers, and bookbinders, will naturally and necessarily, from the unity and harmony of their interests, have a beneficial influence upon all the varied and numerous classes who find employment in the American book trade.

Second objection. That the inevitable effect of an international copyright would be to enhance the price of books to American readers, and consequently to circumscribe their sale. The supposition that because a publisher pays for a foreign copyright he must therefore charge a higher price for the book might be sound if he were to receive from the copyright no corresponding benefit. But he will receive an equivalent in the security it affords against interference; and in the case of popular works he will by the copyright be enabled to stereotype them, which otherwise he could not safely do; and thus the copyright may procure "not a less, but a greater multiplication and cheapness of copies, for the public benefit, along with a larger sale for the benefit of booksellers."‡

It has been suggested that foreign authors may probably charge exorbitant prices for their books; and that "the favored publishers, secure from competition, would doubtless find in the enhancement of price a compensating profit under a restricted sale."† But such objections belong to past years, and were evidently made by persons who little understood the fundamental and now universally acknowledged principles of trade. The price paid for foreign copyrights would be regulated not by the author's own estimate of his genius, but by the popularity of his works, and, as in the case of all commodities, the demand would regulate the supply; and the American publishers who may secure such copyrights, instead of acting on the exploded maxim of restricting sales and raising prices, would pursue their accustomed plan—the great principle of successful business, never better understood than at the present day—of large sales and small profits.

As an illustration of the fact that copyright will not materially enhance the price of books, if indeed it shall enhance it at all, may be cited the two series of works published by Wiley & Putnam, New York, under the joint title of "Library of Choice Books." One of these series consists of foreign reprints, for which nothing is paid, but which is liable to competition; the other of American books of which the copyright has been purchased. Both series are published precisely in the same form and style, and at the same price.

"The statute of Anne," says Chancellor Kent, "had a provision against the scarcity of editions and exorbitancy of price. The act of Congress has no such provision; and it leaves authors to regulate, in their discretion, the number and price of their books, calculating (and probably very correctly) that the interest an author has in a rapid and extensive sale of his work will be sufficient to keep the price reasonable and the market well supplied.‡

Third objection. The want of reciprocity from an alleged scarcity of American books in England. This objection, which was urged with great pertinacity in the report of the Committee on Patents, has been already cited and answered by reference to the annexed list of nearly six hundred American books which have been reprinted in Great Britain.

Fourth objection. That it would prevent the adaptation of English books to American prejudices. "We would also suggest," is the language‖ of a former remonstrance against international copyright, "another point of vital import. If English authors obtain copyrights upon their works here, and our markets are supplied with them, it is apparent that, having no power to adapt them to our wants, our institution, and our state of society, we must permit their circulation as they are. We shall thus have a London literature forced upon us, at once driving our own out of the field, and subjecting the community to its influence. So long as we have power over it, so long as we can shape it as may suit our own taste and condition, we have nothing to fear."

Although we may have "the power," under the present state of things, to mutilate and deface the unprotected works of foreign writers, yet, if authors do possess that property in their productions attributed to them by the committee who framed the present act of Congress, and recognized, in the words of Lord Mansfield, by "the universal consent of ages," then we have no right so to do; and if we had both the power and the right, it would exhibit but little confidence in the stability of our institutions and the principles of their foundation, and but slight reliance on the ability and patriotism of our own authors as the conservators and defenders of their country's honor, were we to shrink from fairly meeting the strictures and arguments of any writers, and especially were we to justify publishers, while appropriating the work of a foreign author, to violate its integrity by wanton and gratuitous interpolations, attributing to him sentiments which he never entertained, obliterating passages which they think may clash with their patrons' prejudices, and pleasantly disposing, by omission, of facts and arguments which might be hard to answer.

The "adaptation" of American books by British publishers has been again and again denounced as unfair, unreasonable, and in every view unjustifiable; and the same reasons which make it a base thing in foreign countries, exist to prevent it from being an honorable thing at home.*

Fifth objection. "That an international copyright law would be unjust, as it would have a retrospective operation, and impair the obligation of existing contracts."† This objection will be avoided by a bill applicable only to books which may be published after its passage.

Sixth objection. "That American copyright is more valuable than that of Great Britain in respect to time and the tax on authors." The Committee on Patents, in their adverse report, remark:

"An extension of copyright is claimed also on the score of reciprocity. But that principle is inadmissible, except where it is attended with equal advantages on both sides. In additional to the inequality already mentioned, it is proper to advert to the difference in the value of copyright under the British and American copyright law. In respect to time, calculating the chances of life and of issue, theirs is one third shorter than ours; and our law exacts of the author but one copy, while that of Great Britain imposes a tax of five, which is complained of there as an unjust and severe exaction."

Since the date of that report, in June, 1838, the term of copyright in Great Britain has been extended, by the act of 5 and 6 Vict., c. 45 (passed July 1, 1842), to forty-two years from the first publication of a work, with a further term of seven years to the author and his assigns—a provision in some respects more to the interest of authors than the copyright act of the United States.

In regard to the number of copies to be required from authors under an international copyright law, there has also been a change in the legislation of both countries. The act of 1 and 2 Victoria, chapter 59, entitled "An act for securing to authors, in certain cases, the benefit of international copyright" (passed 30th July, 1838), requires of the foreign author only one printed copy of each book, and of every volume thereof, to be delivered to the store housekeeper of the company of stationers, for deposit in the Library of the British Museum: Whereas by the act of Congress of 10th August, 1846, chapter 178, section 10, a copy of each book admitted to copyright is required to be delivered to the librarian of the Smithsonian Institution, in addition to that previously required for deposit in the Library of Congress. So that, were foreign authors admitted to the privilege of copyright in America, upon the same terms with our own authors, two copies of their future publications would be deposited in Washington, and thus two new libraries would spring up under the auspices of Congress, without the expenditure of a dollar from the National Treasury; libraries to whose shelves would be added year by year the valuable works to which foreign genius may hereafter give birth, and that would keep pace, in their enlargement, with the progress of letters, so long as the American Union may continue without money and without care.

Your memorialist is impressed with the conviction that the passage of an international copyright law would be attended by the various benefits that have been suggested, unaccompanied by the evils which a few have anticipated, and that such a law, even were it attended by some inconveniences from which it is free, would be warmly welcomed by American readers as an act of justice and benefit to many foreign authors who have for long years, without compensation, delighted and instructed them, and whose unpaid labors have afforded wealth to our publishers, and employment for our artisans in the book trade, and also as an act of justice and benefit to our own authors, borne down by the operation of existing laws intended for their benefit, but marked by an antiquated policy unworthy of our institutions and our age, alike illiberal and unjust.

Your memorialist shows to your honorable bodies that several of the European governments have within the last year entered into conventions with each other for international copyrights, based upon the same principle of reciprocity which was incorporated into the copyright law of several of the United States before the adoption of the constitution, ‡ and that very many of our liberal and enlightened countrymen are earnestly desirous to see the American republic in like manner recognize the rights and protect the interests of all who belong to the republic of letters, and not lag behind in the march of improvement, in which it is her boast to be even found foremost.

Your memorialist is further informed that in most of the copyright conventions recently entered into between European governments, the right of an author in his work is held to include the right to translate it into any foreign language, and that no person is allowed to publish a translation of another's work until the author has had an opportunity of himself supplying such translation, if he thinks fit to do so. And your memorialist submits that the extent to which the works of Cooper, Irving, Prescott, Sedgwick, Poe, and many others of our writers, are systematically translated into the various languages of Europe, renders it a matter of serious importance that the right in foreign translations should, if possible, be secured to American authors.

Your memorialist therefore respectfully prays your honorable bodies to take this subject under consideration, and to enact in amendment of the present law of copyright, with such further provisions and amendments as to your wisdom shall seem meet, that the provisions of the existing law respecting copyrights passed on the 3d day of February, 1831, shall be extended to, and its benefits enjoyed by, the citizens or subjects of any foreign State or country which shall first have granted to the citizens or residents of the United States the same privileges within such foreign State or country in regard to copyrights, as are enjoyed by the citizens or subjects of such foreign State or country, or by those of the most favored nations, upon their depositing a printed copy of the title of the book or other work for which the copyright is desired, in the clerk's office of the district court of any district in the United States, and complying with the other requirements of the said act, and depositng a duplicate copy of such work for the library of the Smithsonian Institute: Provided, That such privileges shall not attach to any of the works enumerated in the aforesaid act, which shall have been etched or engraved, printed or published, prior to the passage of such act for extending the benefits thereof to foreign authors: And provided also, That the title page of the work for which it is intended to secure the copyright shall be deposited in the clerk's office of the district court, as aforesaid, before any foreign copy thereof shall have been imported to this country: And provided also, That such work shall be printed and published in the United States within a specified time after the depositing of the title page as aforesaid.

And, further, that both American and foreign authors shall be equally entitled to copyrights for translations of their works into foreign languages, as for the original works themselves, on complying with the provisions and conditions for that purpose above specified.

And your memorialist will ever pray.

APPENDIX A.

Memorial of citizens of the United States for an international copyright law, December 16, 1843.

To the honorable the House of Representatives of the United States:

This memorial of American publishers and booksellers respectfully represents that your memorialists, publishers and venders of books in the United States, and deeply interested, not only as booksellers in particular, but also as American citizens in general, in the greatest possible diffusion of knowledge and sound literature, are fully convinced, by their experience as traders in books, that the present law regulating literary property is seriously injurious both to the advancement of American literature and to that very extensive branch of American industry which comprehends the whole mechanical department of book-making. It is alike injurious to the business of publishing and to the best and truest interests of the people at large.

Your memorialists, after a careful and mature consideration of the important subject, are fully satisfied that the great interests of knowledge and industry of those who provide the community with reading, and of the vast reading community itself, would be most essentially promoted by the passing of a law which would secure to the authors of all nations the sole right to dispose of their compositions for publication in the United States (whether they may be published in foreign countries or not), provided always the book be printed in the United States within a certain time (to be settled by law) after its publication in a foreign country; and provided also that the copyright for this country shall be transferable from the author to American resident publishers only.

Your memorialists are satisfied that this equitable protection would enable the publishers to furnish their fellow-citizens both with foreign and American literature in such forms and at such prices as would truly meet the wants as well as the means of the people, while the writers of books would receive the just compensation for their labor and talent wherever their works may be read. Your memorialists are of opinion that the interests of the authors, the publishers, and the purchasers are reciprocal, as those of the producer and consumer always are.

Your memorialists would also refer to the fact that no more than a measure such as they respectfully but urgently desire, is necessary, in order to secure at once to the American authors a copyright for their books in Great Britain.

Your memorialists therefore respectfully request your honorable body to take into consideration the present law of copyright in the United States, and to enact such law as may secure to the authors of foreign nations the right to dispose of their works to American publishers, to be printed in this country, providing that such right shall extend to the authors of those countries only whose governments have granted, or may grant, a reciprocal privilege to our authors, and with such other provisions as may seem to your wisdom to be desirable and just.

And your memorialists, etc., etc.

[Senate, 398, Twenty-fifth Congress, second session.]

Memorial of a number of citizens of Boston, praying the passage of an international copyright law.

April 24, 1838.—Referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office, and ordered to be printed.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The undersigned, citizens of the United States, friendly to the due protection of native literature, respectfully request that the attention of Congress be directed to so amending the laws regulating literary property as to extend to all authors writing in the English language the privilege of obtaining a copyright for such works as may be originally or simultaneously printed and published in this country.

We are in favor of the proposed measure both because it is essential to the encouragement and development of American literature, and because it is demanded, with much propriety, as an act of justice by the principal foreign authors interested.

Under the existing system the American author is deprived of an adequate compensation for his labors in consequence of the unequal competition of a vast body of unpaid writers, comprising all the established authors of Great Britain, multiplied editions of whose works, printed frequently in magazines and newspapers, naturally crowd out of the market all those works of native origin to which a copyright tax is attached. The result is that the native author must either be content with so small a profit on his works as may not prevent them from being put on a level, in price, with those gratuitously obtained from their authors, or he must place them so far above the average cost as effectually to exclude them from circulation. It will be readily seen how disadvantageous and depressing this state of things must be to those native writers who may be compelled, by straitened circumstances, to seek for profit as well as fame from their writings. A fair field and no favor is all that they ask. But, under the present system, the operation is precisely as unfavorable to their efforts as if there were an actual bounty upon foreign literary produce and a tax upon all of native origin.

Were there no other good reasons for the proposed international copyright law, the mere fact that the greater part of the foreign authors interested had petitioned for its passage would be, in our estimation, a sufficient argument. We do not wish to purchase editions of books not only unlicensed, but virtually prohibited by the author, and where, by the republication, the author thinks a positive injustice is done him. We do not feel so dependent for our literary resources upon the forthcoming productions of the English petitioners as to inflict what they regard as an injustice in the purchasing or reading of unauthorized editions of their works.

The plea of the British authors appears to us to be founded on the plainest principles of justice. Our law already recognizes the right of native citizens to hold and transfer literary property as fully as it recognizes the right of transferring any other species of property. We cannot well conceive why a foreign author should not have the same liberty and right to consign or transfer literary property to his agents in this country that a foreign merchant has to transfer and consign his merchandise. We can not well conceive why the American creditors of a foreign author should not be enabled to avail themselves in this country of the sale of the products of that author's intellectual labor and ingenuity, as well as the American creditors of a foreign mechanic or manufactures should have the right to receive in payment the products of the latter's physical labor and handicraft. Is not the distinction palpably unjust and impolitic?

A serious evil under the present system, of which the British authors with great justice and propriety complain, is the liability of their works to mutilation and alteration by ignorant and incompetent persons. It is natural that these authors should be jealous of their transatlantic reputation. Their American fame is like the voice of posterity in their favor. How justly, then, may they lament that we permit them to exercise no supervision or control over their works in this country; that their names are often attached to garbled and mutilated publications, for which they are not responsible, and which are no less than gross impositions upon the community.

Another defect in our present system may be seen in the opportunity which is afforded to anonymous authors to avail themselves of a privilege which is denied to those who are known. An anonymous author in England may easily, by collusion with some person in this country, put forth his works as the productions of an American pen, and so enjoy a copyright for them in both countries. The fact is undeniable that Sir Walter Scott had it in his power, while he was unknown as the author of the Waverly novels, to reap the profit of a copyright upon them in this country. Why should he not have been enabled to enjoy the same privilege after he had avowed his authorship?

Your petitioners do not believe that any interests in this country would be injuriously affected by the passage of an international copyright law. It has been asserted that there are $30,000,000 enlisted in the publishing business in this country. Of this, less than $5,000,000 are devoted to the republication of such works as could be subject to a copyright under the proposed law. Of course, the value of the remaining $25,000,000 interest would be rather increased than diminished. The business of republishing new English works, novels, etc., it is well known, is monopolized by three or four of our wealthiest publishers; and it is highly improbable that they would be unfavorably affected in their business by the desired measure.

The only restriction necessary for the ample protection of all classes interested would be a provision that all foreign works, to be entitled to a copyright, should be printed in this country, and that they should be published here simultaneously with their appearance in England.

But, admitting it were true that the publishing interest would be injured by the passage of an international copyright law, your petitioners do not think that the circumstance should weigh in comparison with the great and obvious benefits which would result to the community in general with the nationalizing of our literature, which, under the existing system, is retarded and debased, and with a proper regard to the sacred rights of property.

In conclusion, your petitioners would respectfully urge that they consider the proposed measure as demanded by a due respect for the principles of justice founded in the use of a common language; by a sense of enlightened national reciprocity; and by the great literary interests of both countries. And your petitioners, etc.

[193, Twenty-fourth Congress, second session.]

Petition of the professors of the University of Virginia, praying an alteration of the laws respecting copyrights.

FEBRUARY 20, 1837.—Presented, and ordered to be printed.

To the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

The petition of the undersigned, professors of the University of Virginia, respectfully sheweth:

That your petitioners have long felt and lamented the inadequacy of the law of copyright in the United States, to give that encouragement to the literature and science of the country which its patriotic framers intended, inasmuch as our publishers are neither willing nor able to pay the American author for his labors (except in a few special cases), so long as the productions of British authors can be republished here free of charge.

That in the country from which we derive our origin there is, and is long likely to be, a much larger class exclusively devoted to literary pursuits than with us; from which circumstance, if there was no other point of diversity, American writers must be exposed to a formidable competition; but the effect of that competition is greatly enhanced by the practical operation of the copyright laws of the two countries. In Great Britain the benefit of these laws is extended to American authors, whilst in the United States the benefit is limited to their own citizens. The consequence is, that the British author is protected in the fruits of his mental labor, not only by the temporary monopoly of his works, but also against the probability of being undersold by foreign competitors; and when he has produced a work which has found favor at home, and yielded him a corresponding profit, it is commonly reprinted in the United States and sold at a lower price than American productions for which the authors have received any remuneration: by which means American writers are reduced to the alternative of either giving their works gratuitously to the public, or of seeing them subjected to an enhancement of price from which the productions of their foreign competitors are exempt.

Whatever they receive for their literary labors thus operates as a bounty on the circulation of works reprinted from the British press; and it is impossible that they can enter in the field of competition on equal terms unless your honorable body shall, by extending the privilege of copyright to foreign authors, take from the booksellers the power they now possess of appropriating to themselves the unprotected property of British writers, to undersell the productions of the American press.

Your petitioners respectfully represent that an individual has as just a claim to remuneration from those who profit by his literary labors as from those who profit by any other species of his industry; and while the laws of Great Britain, by extending to aliens the privilege of copyright, have recognized this rule of natural justice, it would not accord with that liberal policy and those principles of reciprocity on which the United States have always acted towards other nations, not to follow her example.

Your petitioners are aware that the present state of things is favorable to the cheapness of new English books, but they are unwilling to believe that this advantage will outweigh the considerations that have been mentioned. If the most strenuous advocate for the doctrines of free trade does not hesitate to admit that, in providing the materials of national defense, the cheapness of the supply should be less regarded than its certainty, and that a part of the nation's wealth is wisely commuted for an addition to its security, he must also admit that the greater cheapness of a portion of its reading should be deemed unimportant when opposed to its justice, its honor, and its literary improvement.

Nor is this greater cheapness an uncompensated benefit. A considerable part of the English books republished in the United States, which could claim the benefit of copyright, are of a light and frivolous character, written confessedly for amusement rather than instruction; some of them, too, inculcating sentiments and principles little suited to the condition of society here, and unfriendly to some of our most cherished institutions. As the authors of such works would naturally seek to derive a profit from their sale here, if the privilege of copyright was extended to them, their circulation would, by the increased price, be materially checked, and the chasm they would leave would be filled either by other British works of more solid worth, or by those native productions which would better harmonize with the principles and feelings of our citizens, and be more apposite to the existing state of the times. In this way many a deleterious potion, when no longer recommended to an undiscriminating public by its superior cheapness, would be made to give place to wholesome aliment.

But if, notwithstanding the considerations that have been presented to your notice, your honorable body should think the greater cheapness of the current British literature is not to be disregarded, your petitioners would respectfully suggest that the privilege now sought to be extended to British authors is capable of being so modified as substantially to secure to them and to American authors the relief they ask, by limiting the monopoly in foreign works to a shorter term than that which is given to American citizens, by which means the supposed disadvantage of paying a higher price for those works would be proportionally diminished.

Hoping that your honorable body will make that change in the law of copyright which, as it seems to your petitioners, is due to strict justice (which our own self-respect enjoins), and is recommended by high considerations of national policy, they, as in duty bound, etc.

[House Doc. No. 162, Twenty-fourth Congress, second session.]

Authors of Great Britain—Address of certain authors of Great Britain to the House of Representatives of the United States, in Congress assembled.

FEBRUARY 13, 1837.—Referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Respectfully showing that authors of Great Britain have long been exposed to injury in their reputation and property from the want of a law by which the exclusive right to their respective writings may be secured to them in the United States of America;

That, for want of such law, deep and extensive injuries have of late been inflicted on their reputation and property and on the interests of literature and science, which ought to constitute a bond of union and friendship between the United States and Great Britain;

That, from the circumstance of the English language being common to both nations, the works of British authors are extensively read throughout the United States of America, while the profits arising from the sale of their works may be wholly appropriated by American book-sellers, not only without the consent of the authors, but even contrary to their express desire, a grievance under which they have at present no redress;

That the works thus appropriated by American book-sellers are liable to be mutilated and altered at the pleasure of the said book-sellers, or of any other persons who may have an interest in reducing the price of the works, or in conciliating the supposed principles or prejudices of purchasers in the respective sections of your Union, and that the names of the authors being retained, they may be made responsible for works which they no longer recognize as their own;

That such mutilation and alteration, with the retention of the authors' names, have been of late actually perpetrated by citizens of the United States; under which grievance such authors have at present no redress;

That certain authors of Great Britain have recently made an effort, in defense of their literary reputation and property, by declaring a respectable firm of publishers in New York to be the sole authorized possessors and issuers of the said works, and by publishing in certain American newspapers their authority to this effect;

That the object of the said authors has been defeated by the act of certain persons, citizens of the United States, who have unjustly published, for their own advantage, the works sought to be thus protected, under which grievance the said authors have at present no redress;

That American authors are injured by the non-existence of the desired law. While American publishers can provide themselves with works for publication by unjust appropriation, instead of by equitable purchase, they are under no inducement to afford to American authors a fair remuneration for their labors, under which grievance American authors have no redress but in sending over their works to England to be published, an expedient which has become an established practice with some of whom their country has most reason to be proud;

That the American public is injured by the non-existence of the desired law. The American public suffers not only from the discouragement afforded to native authors, as above stated, but from the uncertainty now existing as to whether the books presented to them as the works of British authors are the actual and complete productions of the writers whose names they bear;

That, in proof of the evil complained of, the case of Walter Scott might be referred to, as stated by an esteemed citizen of the United States; * that while the works of this author, dear alike to your country and to ours, were read from Maine to Georgia, from the Atlantic to the Mississippi, he received no remuneration from the American public for his labors; that an equitable remuneration might have saved his life, and would at least have relieved its closing years from the burden of debts and destructive toils;

That, deeply impressed with the conviction that the only firm ground of friendship between nations is a strict regard to simple justice, the undersigned earnestly request the House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled speedily to use, in behalf of the authors of Great Britain, their power of securing to the authors the exclusive right to their respective writings.

* Dr. McVickar. Vide letter to the editor of the New York American, November 19, 1836.

Mr. BECK. I wish to inquire whether the Senator from Rhode Island expects a vote on the bill to-night. We hear him very indistinctly. I do not know whether he has been discussing the question I desire to ask him or not. He is not aware how low he speaks. We can not hear him over here. If he is not going to press the bill to a vote to-night, I can have the benefit of reading his speech to-morrow.

Mr. CHACE. I should very much like to bring it to a vote to-night.

Mr. BECK. I desire before it comes to a vote to know, first, what is the object of giving foreign periodicals the right to a copyright here. The publisher of those periodicals may not have written a word of them himself and he may employ the lowest and cheapest pauper labor to write those articles that he can find. And why for forty-two years we should give him the exclusive right, and then couple with it an additional provision that he shall not do either the material or the press-work at home, but shall employ some one here to do the reprinting at any cost that he may see fit, I can not see. How that is going to aid anybody except to add to the cost of the publication, I can not see. That point may have been discussed, but I have not heard it.

Mr. CHACE. I would say to the Senator from Kentucky, not by way of complaint, that while he is not able to hear me I have been able to hear the conversation on his side of the Chamber, and that may, perhaps, account for his not hearing me. I do not quite understand the Senator's question, which was very long.

Mr. BECK. First, why should the publisher of a foreign periodical, who does not, perhaps, write a word of it, be protected by a copyright here, and at the same time have that publication made in this country, the type work, the material, etc., done here, unless a combination of publishers here and publishers abroad seek to increase the price of the work without the brains of either being in it, and make our people pay double price? What is the object of that?

Mr. CHACE. I will say to the Senator that the foreign magazines can not be copyrighted in this country unless they are published simultaneously in this country and that; and if the foreign publisher chooses to do that, I should think the Senator from Kentucky would be the last man to say the foreigner should not have the privilege of coming here and participating in the protection of our laws. I know he would not do it. I imagine he does not intend to do it. I myself know of no reason why a man should not come from Great Britain to this country and set up business in this country and claim and receive all the protection that any citizen of the United States whose father happened to come here before him is entitled to. It seems to me that it is a very broad principle, that my friend from Kentucky must subscribe to.

I do not propose to rest it upon any treaty. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] suggests that the treaty of 1794 provides for it. I rest it on broad principle. I believe we have reached a question at last on which the Senator from Kentucky and myself can agree. At any rate, we ought to.

I noticed that he made an allusion to pauper labor. This is not a question of pauper labor. It is a question of labor here. It is not a question of protection; it is not a question of combination of authors. It is simply a question. Will we provide for the protection of authors and their right in their publications just as other nations do? And the provisions we have in this bill are similar to the provision in the laws of almost all foreign nations—I will not say everywhere. It is a question of the recognition of property rights.

Mr. BECK. Wherein is the publisher of a periodical necessarily an author?

Mr. CHACE. The publisher of a periodical is not necessarily an author, of course, but the Senator certainly would not object to the publisher instead of the author taking out the copyright if it is taken out for the benefit of the author. It is the commonest thing for a man to do a thing by his next friend.

Mr. BECK. I assume that it is not for the benefit of the author in any shape or form.

Mr. CHACE. But the Senator can not assume that. The author sells his article to the publisher, and if neither the publisher nor the author can get a copyright he has nothing to sell. It is a question of protection by law of a right of property. It may be assigned from one to another, and that does not invade the principle, if I apprehend the question.

Mr. President, I will reserve the rest of my remarks for the present until I hear what other gentlemen have to say. I shall have something more to say in regard to this matter, but as the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] has some amendment that he wishes to offer, I will yield the floor.

Mr. MORRILL. I am expecting to support this bill if it shall assume such a shape as I hope it will assume before it is finally voted upon. I do not believe, however, that its passage is to be promoted by stigmatizing our American country as the Barbary coast and our people as pirates in relation to foreign publications. I take it that we have as much right to regulate what shall be introduced and printed here as we have in relation to the persons themselves who come here. We take no property of any foreigners who come here. If they send their books here to be printed and distributed, it is a kind of business that is undertaken in our land and which we may properly regulate as we please, protect or prohibit or exclude. But it does seem to me that it would be going quite far enough for us to grant a reciprocal copyright upon books, for even in that matter we shall give double the advantage to all foreigners that they give to us. Take it in Great Britain where most likely the works will be more numerous than anywhere else that will be brought here for reprinting and republication. A book that 10,000 copies would be considered a large sale of in Great Britain would find here at least 20,000 purchasers. Our people are not only more numerous, nearly twice as numerous, but certainly we have twice as many of those who are in the habit of buying books here as they have in Great Britain.

Now, Mr. President, I shall send to the desk an amendment which has been suggested to me that seems to me entirely reasonable. On page 4, section 2, after line 43, I propose to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That publishers of newspapers or other periodicals in the United States shall be allowed to copy in those publications any articles which may appear in the newspapers or other periodicals of any foreign country, and for that purpose, and not for sale, shall be allowed to import such newspapers and other periodicals.

Mr. President, I do not know how many such publications there are in the country. I know there are several; some that are entirely composed of foreign reprints and some in part. I think there are more than two. These publications commence the volume with the 1st of January. If this bill should become a law the proprietors of these magazines that have received payment for their publications for a year would be compelled to stop their publications at once upon the passage of this bill, and therefore be compelled to refund the payment of anything that had been paid for the entire volume, say to the 1st of January, 1889.

But outside of that, it seems to me that it is rather a small business for us to give a chance for copyrighting articles in magazines and newspapers, and I trust that the amendment which I have proposed will appear to the Senate a reasonable proposition and be accepted.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment, to come in on page 6, in section 4, line 4: Strike out from the word "and" to the word "above," inclusive, in line 6, and insert:

Provided, That newspapers, magazines, and periodicals shall not be entitled to copyright as herein provided.

Mr. CHACE. Does the Senator offer that as an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. VANCE. No, sir; as a distinct amendment.

Mr. CHACE. It is very similar in its character.

Mr. VANCE. No, sir; it is not similar in character. I simply desire to say in support of my amendment——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before the Senator proceeds let the amendment be reported at the desk.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 6 of section 4, line 4, after the word "effect," it is proposed to strike out all down to and including the word "above," in line 6, as follows:

And each number of a periodical shall be considered an independent publication, subject to the form of copyrighting as above.

And insert in lieu thereof:

Provided, That newspapers, magazines, and periodicals shall not be entitled to copyright as herein provided.

Mr. VANCE. This has reference to what I presume is well known as to the way in which magazines and periodicals are conducted. The publisher or owner of the publication employs writers to write articles for his magazine and pays them therefor, so that so far as the authorship of these magazine articles is concerned there is the end of the matter. Any subsequent profit inures to the publisher. If the design of this copyright law and all others is to reward genius that gives to the world valuable thoughts and information, this will not answer the purpose, for in all cases the publisher of the magazine when he has paid for his matter dismisses the genius who furnishes it to him and sends it over here, and copyrights his magazine and reaps all the reward himself.

It seems to me that this is in pursuance of the universal policy which runs through and permeates everything; that it is a sin and a wrong against the present generation that we should have anything without a tax. We have an enormous duty on school-books; we have a duty on children's slates and children's pencils. We have a duty on books, maps, charts, and other implements of information and education for our people. By the genius of our American workmen and the machinery which has been invented we have been enabled to excel almost all the people of the world in the matter of cheap literature; and seeing that our literature was becoming too cheap, this plan, I suppose, has been fallen upon to induce the rivalry of Great Britain, in order that, it being protected by a patent or a monopoly of publication in the interest of books, it will increase the price of our literature also and prevent the diffusion of it amongst those who are illy able to pay for high-priced literature.

It seems to me that can only be the result. I thought so at the beginning of this agitation in starting the copyright, but when I heard the Senator from Rhode Island solemnly assure the Senate and enter into an argument to prove, as usual, in the old-fashioned, well-established method, that this would absolutely cheapen literature, as high protective tariffs always cheapen production, then I was sure what the effect of it would be; and therefore, to save what little I can out of the wreck for that vast body of our people who are not able to pay for high-priced books, but who can manage to pay for the current literature of Europe when introduced into this country without a copyright, I offer this amendment.

Mr. CHACE. Mr. President, I should like to have the amendment read again; but what has become of the amendment of the Senator from Vermont?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is pending.

Mr. CHACE. Which is to be acted on first?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont must be first acted on.

Mr. CHACE. Then I should like to have that reported again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Vermont will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment of Mr. MORRILL, as follows:

Provided, That publishers of newspapers or other periodicals in the United States shall be allowed to copy in those publications any articles which may appear in the newspapers or other periodicals of any foreign country, and for that purpose, but not for sale, shall be allowed to import such newspapers and other periodicals.

Mr. CHACE. I take it that the Senator does not care to put the newspapers in, because it is a matter of utter impossibility for a foreign newspaper to be copyrighted in this country. It must be published in both countries simultaneously in order to be copyrighted; and that would be a matter of impossibility, so I take it that is mere surplusage, and I shall not address myself to it at all.

So far as the question of the magazines is concerned, to which the Senator has alluded, it is the simple question whether you will protect the man with large interests and leave the little man out from under the protection of the law. Whether the man who publishes a great book, who has earned a reputation as an author, attained a position before the public, who is independent and has means—probably an income from his works—shall be cared for by the law, but the struggling young author, who has no other means to reach the public except through magazine literature, shall be exempted from your protection. That is the question.

So far as the moral question is concerned, it seems to me no Senator can hesitate for a moment. It would appeal to every man's sense of honor and justice. It seems to me that if you are to take care of the man who is well-to-do, certainly your law should take care of the struggling author who is seeking to make his way and get a place before the public.

Mr. BECK. The object of this bill I understand is to disseminate knowledge among men.

Mr. CHACE. Certainly, to encourage it.

Mr. BECK. Now, why not allow our own people to obtain in the cheapest way they can the product of the brains of foreigners? In other words, if we are to help our own people and at the same time allow the people of all foreign countries to have the reward of their own genius and their own talents, why not have free trade as regards books among all countries? Then our people would get the cheapest and everybody would be protected at home and abroad, and the people would get the benefit. That would be fair all around, would it not?

Mr. CHACE. I would say to the Senator that that is a very Utopian idea. If we could get the foreign countries to do it, perhaps we might; but they do not do it, and they will not do it.

Mr. BECK. Suppose we make the offer to them to bring their books in free for our people if they will do the same thing, and they would jump at it, I think.

Mr. CHACE. Is the Senator prepared to do that? Will he extend it to all kinds of property?

Mr. BECK. To free books. That is in the line of the educational bill and other things of that kind.

Mr. CHACE. This red rag of free trade and protection is constantly before the Senator's eyes; it has no more to do with this question than the approach of the next comet. It is utterly irrelevant. This is simply a question of property right.

Mr. BECK. It is free trade and the dissemination of knowledge.

Mr. CHACE. It has no effect upon the question of free trade one way or the other. It is a question whether you will protect in the possession of his property a man who creates something out of his brain as you protect a man who creates something by the labor of his hands. You acknowledge his right by the existence of your present statute, by the domestic copyright law. You acknowledge the principle that this is a property right and deserving of the protection of the law. All nations all over the world acknowledge that right, and they apply it both to themselves and foreigners, except ourselves, to our shame and disgrace.

It is not a question of free trade and it is not a question of protection. In reply to the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] I am almost tempted to say to him that the most earnest and staunchest advocates of the bill in this country are the strongest free-traders I know of. It is supported and defended and asked for by men on all sides of the question of protection and free trade. It has nothing to do with the question of free trade. It has nothing to do with the question of protection.

If the Senator from North Carolina wants to know, I will admit that you will get one book cheaper if you steal it; but if the law does not put any penalty upon you for theft, the penalty is inevitable, and you will suffer for it in the end, and we are suffering for it now in this country. The growth of literature is cramped. Our authors suffer and are debarred from foreign markets for their works. The nation which cramps and stints the growth of its literature is injured vitally.

Now, who is to be benefited? In the first place, you are going to open the foreign field to American authors; you are going to give them the chance of enjoying the right that the Government of the United States owes to them as it owes it to every other citizen. Wherever our flag sails, whatever property it covers, we follow it and we insist that foreign nations shall recognize it and protect it. Long years ago we sent to the Bey of Tunis our fleet and demanded at the cannon's mouth that he should recognize the rights of property of American citizens. We might go there to-day with the same demand, and he would say, "Oh, but you do not recognize the rights of my citizens." That is the principle that is involved; it is not the question of protection or free trade. It is the commonest principle of right and justice; it is the question whether you will help your own authors by protecting foreign authors; it is the question whether you will encourage the growth of American literature by opening to your American authors the broad field which covers the whole world instead of limiting them, as you do at the present time, to the United States.

As regards my friend, the honorable and venerable Senator from Vermont, who comes here to defend the publishers of the eclectic magazines, I wish to say to him I consider it a very low order of argument and I am a little ashamed to make it, but such is the fact, that his friends, the publishers of those magazines, are not likely to be interfered with, because, as I said a few minutes ago, the publishers of foreign magazines are not going to publish simultaneously in this country, as they must do to get their copyright; his friends will still be able to copy those foreign articles without paying for them; so that his amendment is inconsequential and is surplusage in this bill, and bad and unwholesome in principle, and I hope the Senate will vote it down.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope the Senate will not vote down the amendment. It is well known that Harper's Magazine and the Century Magazine are published in England simultaneously with their publication here. It is also known that newspapers here, and I suppose abroad, are frequently in the habit of copyrighting articles that are published in their papers.

It struck me that this amendment, which was sent to me, was a proper one, and I had no idea that it would be resisted. Certainly if there is no necessity for it now under the provisions of the bill, it can do no harm to adopt it. I trust, therefore, it will receive the favor of the Senate.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. President, I thought it possible when the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE] was making his argument that this bill might go to its passage without the question being raised that it was a measure of protection; but as that issue has now been practically made in the discussion, there is no use in attempting to disguise it, and it may as well be fairly met.

It is true, in my judgment, that the foreign author is no more entitled to protection in the American markets for the work of his brain than the foreign producer of the coat upon my back is to an open and free market there, and I do not believe there is any refinement in reasoning which can establish a distinction between the two.

Mr. KENNA. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question in that connection?

Mr. HISCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. KENNA. I should like to ask him if he does not know that the coat on his back and every known process of manufacture that produces it commands and pays tribute to the brain work of the men who have invented the various elements of machinery that enter into its manufacture?

Mr. HISCOCK. Certainly; I agree to that, so far as that element is concerned. The pending bill is not made an international copyright bill, because, as has been well illustrated by the Senator from Rhode Island, it is practically impossible to do that. On account of the various laws which exist in foreign nations and our constitutional limitation, that is practically impossible.

Then why is the bill in this form presented here? For this reason, and for this reason alone, that the producers, if you please, of foreign magazines or of foreign books will take out their copyrights on their productions in the United States, and to the extent of the value of that copyright, or its cost to the publishers of their books, the publications will be increased in value or price or cost here in the United States; and to some extent at least that affects, increases the price of American literature. It will increase, it is argued, and I hope, just that per cent.

It is true, I state in this connection, that the highest value of a copyright, so far as I have been able to learn by an investigation, is not to exceed 10 per cent. on the cost of the publications, the lowest measure of protection which is afforded to men of any class in the United States. As I understand it, there is not a gentleman upon this or the other side of the Chamber who is not willing to afford that measure of protection to the labor of the hand or of the brain in the United States. I repeat, the average would not exceed 10 per cent.

Under the copyright arrangement most frequent in this country the author receives a royalty on the copies of his book sold of 10 per cent. of the retail price—a dollar book, for instance, bringing to the author a return of $100 per 1,000 copies sold.

In England and in Germany the arrangement more frequent is to purchase outright the copyright of the author, and under such an arrangement the amount to be debited to each copy against the payment to the author must, of course, depend upon the final number of copies sold.

In France the American method of royalty on sales is the more general.

As an example of the English method, American publishers paid, for instance to Professor Mahaffy, of Dublin University, for the writing of his "Story of Alexander's Empire," the sum of £300. If they sell 5,000 copies of the book, this sum, the equivalent of $1,500, would be divided between these 5,000, making the cost of the author's royalty per copy, 30 cents. If they double the sale, the amount to be debited against each copy for the author's payment is necessarily halved. Therefore, the larger the market for a book, the smaller the amount to be debited to each copy for the compensation of the author.

If under a trans-Atlantic arrangement the markets of two or three countries can be assured, either to American or to European works, this author's payment will be proportionately reduced, and the selling price of the books can be, and will be, made proportionately lower.

I desire to supplement this by the further statement that the poorest paid labor in the United States and in the whole world is that of authors and writers. They are without fortune when they first commence, and usually at the close of their career with nothing but their talents and education for capital, and whether they can earn anything or not must depend upon the merit of their labor. If they undertake to write for magazines their positions and compensations depend upon their genius and their education. Poorly paid, poorly fed, and poorly clothed they are. This bill proposes to give authors the meager protection of not to exceed 10 per cent. on the cost to the public of the fruits of their labor; that is, 10 per cent. upon the value of the goods as sold in the market. It may possibly add so much to the price of a book, but no more.

Where is there an author who has accumulated a fortune who is a monopolist? Where is there one who is not struggling on from day to day to support himself and his family? Take the magazine articles that we read. I am in favor of the protection of the American magazines. Brilliant men are writing upon them. Articles appear in those magazines from the pens of the most accomplished and the most highly educated ladies and gentlemen, both living, perhaps, upon a salary of $1,000, $1,500, or $2,000 a year at the most, and supporting a family, or, as is more often the case, on account of their poverty being compelled to forego domestic life.

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question for information?

Mr. HISCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. BECK. There is another difficulty which I should like to have the Senator explain. French, English, and German books are printed in this country in cheap editions. Under this proposed international copyright law, will not the German, the Frenchman, and the Englishman have a right under his copyright in this country to print the edition in any form that he likes and exclude altogether from the American market the cheap edition, which can now be published?

Mr. HISCOCK. Oh, no; I suppose not. It is not supposed that that will be the effect of the bill at all.

Mr. BECK. If he has the copyright, he surely can control it.

Mr. HISCOCK. There will be precisely the same interest in the publication of cheap works that there is now. To the publishers the cost of the copyright is like the cost of the advertising, of the engraving, of the stereotyping, of his rent, and the more editions of the work he publishes the less their cost to the public. These fixed charges are spread over them. The publishers' profit is not on the copyright alone, but upon every element of cost that enters into the book, and in so far as this cost would all apply to one volume, if only one volume were published, it is distributed upon 1,000 volumes if they are published.

Mr. BECK. If the American publisher of a foreign author believes that a gilt-edged book is the one he can make the most money out of, and if it is a book that the people will have, and rather than not have the work in some form they will buy the costly edition, does it not put it in the power of the publisher in our own country to print a single edition which will give the most money to the publisher and the author and exclude the body of the American people from reading the book in any shape or form?

Mr. HISCOCK. It seems to me not, for the reason that the compensation which is given to the author is distributed, in most instances certainly, upon the number of volumes which are to be published. I have investigated that question very thoroughly, and in the cases of which I have been advised the copyright or its cost to the publisher is always made dependent upon the sales that are expected of the work or publication.

Mr. CHACE. If the Senator from New York will allow me one moment, I think it is a good answer to the Senator from Kentucky to say that the books published in this country, written by American authors, which are copyrighted in this country and which would have the same prescriptive right as against the public to which he alludes, are now published cheaper than any other books are published in the world, and why? Because the publishers think that it is to their interest to publish a very large number of volumes and sell them at a low price with a small profit on each volume; the net result is better to them.

Now, the same principle would apply whether they are publishing a foreign book or an American book, and in some instances where they have published foreign books, taking the risk of being pirated, as it is called, they have adopted that principle and published the book very cheaply; in one instance I have in mind it was sold for less than a quarter what the same edition was put on the English market for.

Mr. HISCOCK. The Senator from Kentucky will readily appreciate, the publisher has paid so much for the copyright, he makes his profit upon the volume of his business. There are certain charges that must be paid whether that volume is large or small, and the cost of the copyright is one of them, and it is distributed upon the sale, whatever it is, large or small.

The real profit, as I understand it, to the publishing houses in the majority of cases, of the copyright to them, depends upon the number of volumes which they can sell of the work. The more editions, the more profit; and, as I said before, the sums paid to the author have been dependent upon the number of copies of the book which the publishers expected to sell, distributed upon one thousand or ten thousand copies, as the case might be.

Mr. President, I think that I have at least made obvious the ground upon which I consented as one of the Committee on Patents to the report of this bill. We were told by those who seemed to be well advised in reference to the question that with this country flooded with cheap foreign literature, as it is, it is gradually drawing from the profession of authorship (and I suppose we may style that a profession) the best and the brightest young men who were in it, and deterring others from entering the profession. Authors have entered their profession with high ambition and hopeful of the future; but the cheap novels, the trash which is scattered all over the country, has come in direct competition with them, and they have retired from the field; and they tell us there has been a decay constantly going on in American literature for a number of years, and that it is gradually increasing. Perhaps I should change the word "gradually" and say that it is rapidly increasing.

That is the evidence which came before your committee which investigated this question. The authors appeared there and did not ask for a high measure of protection. You can not possibly make it to be more than 10 per cent. upon the value of the books as they are sold—less than that in many cases; $500 is a large compensation for a valuable work, which may have cost the author six months or a year to prepare; and the copyright which is paid to him on that volume is divided and distributed upon all the volumes and editions of it which are issued as long as the copyright exists.

It is unnecessary to have an international-copyright law. As I suggested in the outset, it would embarrass and defeat the object of this bill, for the reason that it is in that small percentage which is added to the value of the copyrighted works of foreign authors sold here that the American authors are looking to for protection more than to the foreign markets that may be preserved to them.

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator tell us where he gets that 10 per cent.?

Mr. HISCOCK. I am not aware that it is in the report. I have corresponded with publishing houses upon the subject, and I have letters which they have written me giving me usually the value of copyright, the amount which it returns to the author, etc., the distribution upon the volume of publication if bought outright by the publisher, and the sum paid upon each publication if it depends upon the sales.

Mr. BECK. That 10 per cent. may apply between the author and the publisher in their relations with each other; but an American publisher gets hold of a foreign book that the American people desire to read, and that they will read at some price, and all competition is destroyed, for he is the owner of the copyright; it is his property for forty-two years, and nobody else can publish it; nobody can send it from abroad; no other American publisher can compete with him; and when he finds it is a book of value, why can not he put up the price 50 or 100 per cent. to the person who reads it, while it may be only 10 per cent. between him and the author? It is the reading public whom I seek to protect, if I can.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to say in answer to that, that we never should legislate with reference to an extreme case which may be imagined. The profit of the author comes from the large number of copies of the book which the publisher may print, publish, and put upon the market.

Again, there has never yet been a book published, so far as I am advised, a novel, in reference to an astronomical, a geological, a historical, or upon any subject, that was so unique in its character, so valuable in the material which it collected, but that another author will be able to put on the market another work in substantially the same line, treating the same subject from his standpoint, using, perhaps, the same facts, referring to the same authorities, and appealing to the same tastes. In this way the price of the books themselves are regulated; and it has been found to be out of the power of any man or woman, however gifted, to create a monopoly in the way suggested by the Senator from Kentucky.

In reference to works of fiction I imagine that none will be published so remarkable in their character, so vivid in their details, so entrancing, but that others will be published that will appeal equally to the tastes of the people and hold the market and force down the price of the product of the brain of authors engaged in that branch of work in the market. My judgment is, and I think experience has proved, that with reference to the most valuable works which have been written and which have been copyrighted, they have been the cheapest in the market, because they have been the more universally demanded among the people, and their sales have been consequently large.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from New York allow me to make a suggestion in regard to the question of the Senator from Kentucky, if it will not interrupt him?

Mr. HISCOCK. It will not; I am nearly through.

Mr. HOAR. The thing does not work practically in the mode suggested by the Senator from Kentucky. Unless there be a cheap edition upon the market, the demand for that edition diminishes under the practices of our people. They resort to book-clubs, where one copy furnishes twenty people, and they wait a little before they read it. They resort to public libraries, which are becoming enormously multiplied all over this country, especially in the compact parts. They resort to circulating libraries.

In England, as the Senator very well knows, the practice in the publication of new important works, whether works of fiction or science, is to publish a costly edition. That answers the entire demand of the English public for the first year, and it is almost entirely bought up by Mudie, or Smith, or some half a dozen of the great circulating library men. The people get their supply of those works from those libraries, and the cheap edition does not come out for a year or two after the author publishes the work.

In our country the practice is altogether different. Where you can get a tolerably cheap edition of a book for half a dollar or a dollar everybody buys it and wants to read it; but if the author undertook to substitute a two-dollar or a three-dollar edition of the book the result would be that there would not be one-twentieth or one-fiftieth part of the number of copies sold, because they would be taken by the public libraries and the people would get the book in that way. I had occasion myself to send abroad for a novel by Thomas Adolphus Trollope a few years ago, and when I got it the English edition of that ordinary novel cost $14.50, when about a year after that there was a five-shilling edition of it.

Mr. BECK. I wish to state what was running in my mind, if the Senator from New York will allow me.

Mr. HISCOCK. Yes: go on.

Mr. BECK. I was thinking about such a case as this: When I was a young man studying law I could buy Blackstone for $4, and I paid $12 for Kent. There are no more valuable books perhaps. They are books indispensable to a young man studying his profession. Of course the works of Kent were protected by copyright and were more costly. What interest is it to the American people that some publisher should get the exclusive right to publish Blackstone?

Mr. HISCOCK. Blackstone was not copyrighted at the time you purchased it.

Mr. BECK. Certainly it was not, for I got it for half what a book like that printed in England and copyrighted here would sell for.

Mr. HOAR. There is three times as much matter in Kent as Blackstone, and that explains the difference in price.

Mr. HISCOCK. I thank the Senator from Kentucky for calling attention to Blackstone, and it will help to illustrate my argument. A bright lawyer, a young man, devotes himself to preparing elaborate notes upon Blackstone. His genius is all he has. To the extent of this copyright measure he would be protected in that work. He might have devoted years to the preparation of those notes, and without such a measure as this a book could be prepared upon the other side and brought here by some one who pirated it—that phrase is good enough—and put into competition against him; and the result would be that he would receive nothing for his copyright.

That illustrates this bill. You may take a work on evidence. A young man devotes years, if you please, to preparing notes upon an English author on evidence and he gets his work copyrighted here, and a work upon the other side may be published on a line with it and pirated and brought here and put into the market against him, and this young man gets nothing for his copyright. That illustrates it, and illustrates the principle underlying this bill.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question there?

Mr. HISCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. Does he know of any instance in which an American lawyer has prepared an American edition of an English book with American notes, and then an Englishman has published an edition in competition with that?

Mr. HISCOCK. I do not know that I recall one. I can not say that I do. Perhaps that case has not occurred. I took that as ready at hand to illustrate the principle of this bill.

Mr. BECK. One word, and I shall not trouble the Senator again. I got a table about an hour ago showing a class of English publications, and it seems that the increase of every class of books has been very much since 1880. The increase is as follows: Fine-art and illustrated books, 400 per cent.; literary history and miscellany, 250 per cent.; biography, memoirs, 40 per cent.; works of fiction, 330 per cent. As the table is short, I will hand it to the Reporter, to be inserted in the RECORD, so that Senators may see it. I do not know how correct it is.

The table is as follows:

† History, including biography.

Mr. HISCOCK. So far as law-books are concerned the increase, as the Senator very well knows, is in the publication of our reports, which would account for all that. That there has been an increase in the volume of literature I think is true. I think that is conceded by the people who came before the committee, that there has been an increase in the volume of it, and a depreciation, a great depreciation, in the character of it.

Now, Mr. President, I would not expect that this bill would pass if it proposed a measure of protection to American talent and American authors which in any sense could be characterized as a monopoly. Whatever protection there is in it is not to such so great as it is afforded to every other class of workers; and it is offering a meager premium for their labors to the educators of the country, to the educated men of the country, to the scholars of the country, to the young men of the country who see in a career of literature at least honors and hope to realize from it an adequate reward for their services, not enough to make them rich—no, no, they will be poor when their work is done and their lives ended.

It will be all they can do to support themselves; they will be poor authors, I fear, still. The great work which they have in hand, and which they are doing now in the magazine articles which we have from them in these books which we lay our hands upon in every library and in every book-store, which enable us within an hour almost to equip ourselves upon any subject and every question of political economy, science, and history, is of inestimable value to all classes in our country, and to these men, to these educators, this bill promises some little reward and some little recognition.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President——

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator give way for a motion for an executive session?

Mr. BLAIR. Yes, sir.

Mr. VEST. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before submitting that motion the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 2083) to provide for the establishment of a bureau of animal industry, and to facilitate the exportation of live-stock and their products, to extirpate contagious pleuro-pneumonia and other diseases among domestic animals, and for other purposes.

The Senator from Missouri moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. DOLPH. I appeal to the Senator from Missouri to give me his attention for a moment. Will he not withhold his motion until I can call up a bill that was passed over in my absence when off on official duty visiting the Arthur Kill bridge, three weeks ago last Saturday? It was passed over on account of my absence.

Mr. VEST. I give way.

REVENUE-CUTTER THOMAS CORWIN.

Mr. DOLPH. As the Senator gives way I ask unanimous consent that Senate bill 46 be taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be laid aside temporarily and that the bill (S. 46) for the relief of the First National Bank of Portland, Oregon, be taken up.

Mr. DOLPH. The bill has twice passed the Senate.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. DOLPH. There is a House bill identical with the Senate bill, and as soon as it is in order I shall ask that the House bill be substituted for the Senate bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator can move to proceed now to the consideration of the House bill and postpone indefinitely the Senate bill.

Mr. DOLPH. I make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1761) for the relief of the First National Bank of Portland, Oregon, for money advanced the Oregon Iron Works, the contractor in building the United States revenue-cutter Thomas Corwin.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides for the payment to the First National Bank of Portland, Oregon, of $8,249.23 for moneys advanced by that bank to the Oregon Iron Works, the contractor with the United States for the construction of the revenue-cutter Thomas Corwin, built at Albina, Oregon, during the years 1875 and 1876, upon the security of the hypothecation of the payments to be made by the United States to the contractor and used in the construction of the revenue-cutter, and which sum has not been paid to the bank.

Mr. MITCHELL. There are two Senate bills reported unanimously from the Committee on Claims relating to this same subject. One of the bills has passed the other House and has just been read, for the relief of the First National Bank of Portland, Oregon. The other has not yet passed the House, and the two Senate bills unanimously reported and on the Calendar relate to the same subject-matter, for the relief of parties growing out of the same transaction. I move to amend the House bill by adding the other Senate bill, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

Mr. DOLPH. Both bills have twice passed the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator can not move to amend by adding a Senate bill, but he can move to amend by adding the matter therein contained.

Mr. MITCHELL. I move as an additional section the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend by adding as a new section the following:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to R. G. Combs, ship-carpenter, of Portland, Oregon, the sum of $93; to A. Thompson, ship-carpenter, of Portland, Oregon, the sum of $134.37; to William I. Henry, of same place, the sum of $127; to Thomas Homes, of same place, ship-carpenter, the sum of $84.75; to Rhys Gwynn, of same place, night watchman, the sum of $127.50; to R. H. Holmes, of same place, ship-carpenter, the sum of $53; to Thomas Bulger, of same place, ship-carpenter, the sum of $117.50; to Edward Magee, of same place, ship-carpenter, the sum of $106.75; to Edward Cashen, the sum of $77.50; to John Smith, of same place, ship-carpenter, the sum of $158; to Ezra Brentnall, ship-carpenter, of same place, the sum of $60; to Ola Hansen, ship-carpenter, of same place, the sum of $31.50; to Reuben Crawford, ship-carpenter, of same place, the sum of $45; to John Thomas, ship-carpenter, of same place, the sum of $48.50; to B. A. Rickdol, ship-carpenter, of same place, the sum of $137.50; to Goldsmith & Loewenberg, of same place, hardware merchants, the sum of $889.17, for materials furnished; to Hodge, Snell & Co., of same place, druggists, etc., the sum of $132.62, for paints and oils; to Northup & Thompson, of same place, hardware merchants, the sum of $381, for iron, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; the several sums set opposite each of the foregoing names being the value of labor and materials furnished in the building of the United States revenue-cutter called Thomas Corwin, built at Albina, Oregon, during the years 1875 and 1876, and for which labor and materials no sum whatever has ever been paid.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DOLPH. The title should be amended by adding the words "and for other purposes."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The title will be so amended, if there be no objection.

Mr. MITCHELL. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments, and ask for a conference on the bill and amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. MITCHELL, Mr. SPOONER, and Mr. WILSON of Maryland were appointed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill (S. 46) for the relief of the First National Bank of Portland, Oregon, will be indefinitely postponed, if there be no objection.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT KEY WEST.

Mr. VEST. I renew the motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CALL. I hope the Senator will yield for a moment.

Mr. VEST I want an executive session.

Mr. CALL. I want to call up a bill that will only take a moment. It is in regard to a public building at Key West, in my State.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri insist on his motion?

Mr. VEST. No, sir.

Mr. CALL. I move to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 218, Order of Business 1013.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida asks that the unfinished business be informally laid aside and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 218.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 218) to change the limit of appropriation for the public building at Key West, Fla.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, line 4, after the word "approved," to insert "February 28, 1885;" in line 6, before the word "hundred," to strike out "two" and insert "one;" and in the same line, after the words "hundred and," to strike out "fifty" and insert "seventy-five;" so as to make the section read:

That the act entitled "An act for the erection of a public building at Key West, Fla.," approved February 28, 1885, be amended by making the limit for said building $175,000, and that sum is hereby fixed as the limit of cost thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, line 1, before the words "sum of," to insert "additional;" and after the words "sum of," to strike out "two hundred and fifty," and insert "sixty-seven;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. That the additional sum of $67,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purposes of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. VEST. I now renew my motion for an executive session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before submitting the motion the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 2083) to provide for the establishment of a bureau of animal industry, and to facilitate the exportation of live-stock and their products, to extirpate contagious pleuro-pneumonia and other diseases among domestic animals, and for other purposes.

The question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri.

FRANCES ANNE PYNE RICKETTS.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order for this morning, after the reading of the Journal, is the consideration of the bill (S. 393) for the relief of Frances Anne Pyne Ricketts. By order of the House the previous question is ordered on the third reading of the bill, and fifteen minutes on each side are allowed for debate. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CHEADLE] in opposition to the bill, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] in support of it.

Mr. BLAND. I ask the gentleman from Indiana, who controls the time in opposition to the bill, to yield to me that I may offer an amendment.

Mr. CHEADLE. I will yield the gentleman four minutes after I have concluded my remarks.

Mr. Speaker, the practical question involved in the bill under consideration is, shall the law governing the granting and rating of pensions be set aside and a special pension be granted at a rate more than three times greater than that authorized by law?

There underlies our system of government a principle of vital importance to national life, and that is the equality of citizenship under the laws of the land; and I hold that our safety lies in adhering strictly in this class of legislation to the letter and spirit of the law. The laws now in force are, I think, a fair expression of the public sentiment of the nation upon the question of pension ratings. The highest rate authorized by law to be paid a soldier is $72 a month. The highest rate authorized to be paid the widow of an officer above the grade of lieutenant-colonel is $30 a month.

The only way by which we can arrive at a conclusion of the justice of these latter ratings is to institute a comparison between the rate of $30 a month, $360 a year, allowed the widow of the officer, and the rate allowed the widow of an enlisted man. The latter is paid only $12 a month, $144 a year. Thus we find that the law has given to the widow of a general officer above the grade of lieutenant-colonel two and one-half times more pension than is paid the widow of the private soldier. This is a liberal discrimination in their favor, quite as much so, I take it, as can be justified under our form of government, where equality before the law and equal rights and privileges are fundamental principles, and where one life equals another life, and where caste and class are not known or tolerated at all. The distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] and other gentlemen who favor these measures tell us that this distinction is not great enough; that some should have $50 a month, others $1,200 a year, and still others $2,000 a year. I say, Mr. Speaker, that this bill is, and all similar ones are, in direct conflict with the fundamental principles of our Government; that they are dangerous and pernicious in their tendencies, inimical to the public welfare, an insult to the widow of every private soldier and officer below the grade of lieutenant-colonel, and ought never be introduced and brought here for consideration.

I grant all that has been said in behalf of the distinguished services rendered by the husband of the claimant in the bill under consideration. These services brought him position, and honors, and the pay and emoluments of the rank to which he attained. Grant all that is claimed, all that can be claimed, and then, Mr. Speaker, see how it all becomes dwarfed into littleness compared with the claims of the widow of the private soldier, who in 1861 bid her good-by, and went down to the front, and was afterwards killed at Antietam or Gettysburgh, leaving her to sit amid the desolation of a broken home all these intervening years. If the claimant in this bill is entitled to a pension of $1,200 a year by reason of the distinguished services of her husband, services which brought to them both honors, rank, pay, and the solace of enjoyment of honors conferred for a long period of years, what shall the widow be entitled to whose husband died in the war, thus depriving her of his support, companionship, sympathy, and love all the years since then; left her perchance to struggle with poverty and want in order to keep together the children born to them? Again, if these special cases are entitled to $1,200 or $2,000 a year, what shall be the measure of the pension to the mother who gave one, two, three, four, five, and in rare instances six sons to die that the Government might live?

If these special cases are entitled to $1,200 or $2,000 a year, what shall be the measure of the widow's pension who gave not only her husband, but in addition thereto gave one, two, three, and in one case of record four sons to die for their country?

Mr. Speaker, what greater service, what more distinguished services can a citizen perform for his government than to offer his life a willing sacrifice and die in its defense? Take the case of a mother I knew, who had three sons grown to man's estate when the war began, all of whom volunteered early in 1861, all of whom gave their lives ere the year 1862 had ended upon fields of battle, died fighting to preserve and perpetuate this Government of the people wherein every citizen is guarantied the sovereignty of equality before the law. If, Mr. Speaker, the claimant in this case is entitled to a pension of $1,200 a year, who can estimate the pension in dollars and cents to which the mother I referred to should be entitled?

I have made these comparisons to show that there is not one single reason urged in favor of any one of these special pensions that can not be urged with tenfold more force in behalf of some other and infinitely more meritorious case. Therefore I appeal to the deliberate judgment of the members of the House, and ask them to call a halt in the enactment of these special pensions for the favored few. Let us not forget our duty to the brave men who periled life to save the Government. I would provide for all of them liberally, and for their widows and orphans, but I would treat them all alike. Pension them under the general laws where the ratings are uniform and where we can do comparative justice to all of them. This is our highest duty, Mr. Speaker. The officers did not put down the rebellion; they did not save the Union. They did not make all the sacrifices. The men of the muskets saved the Union. The enlisted men made the great sacrifices required in order to preserve the life of the Government. We are indebted to them for all the blessings of this freest, best, most prosperous Government on earth. We owe these men a debt of gratitude we never can repay. There are some things, however, we can do for them. There are some things we ought to do for them. The Government made a solemn contract with its soldiers to pay them $13 a month in gold or its equivalent. That promise has not been fulfilled. There is a great surplus in the national Treasury, every dollar of which is there because of the dauntless courage and patriotic sufferings of the Union soldiers. The Government can and it should make good the solemn promise made its defenders. The Government promised the men who loaned it money to prosecute its defense to pay them in gold or its equivalent.

I rejoice as an American that my Government kept its promise with the men who furnished it money, and pays them every cent due. I now demand that it keep its promises made to the Union soldiers who saved the Union and thus made it possible for the Government to pay its debts. I demand that the claims of Union soldiers shall be placed upon an equality, side by side, with the claims of the men who furnished it money, that they be paid as honestly in gold or its equivalent as the men who risked their gold. The obligation of the Government to the Union soldier is the most solemn one that could be made. To keep that promise is to execute justice, and this is the first and highest duty of the Government to its soldiers. Shall this Government of the people do less for those who risked life in its defense than it does for those who risked money? That is the question. The solution of this problem lies in the enactment of a service pension now for all who are disabled from service in camp or field.

The Government promised to care for the widow of him who died in battle or on the march, and for his orphans; for him who was broken in health, care for him tenderly. We are doing more than any Government ever did for its soldiers. The other day, without debate, we appropriated eighty millions for pensions, and yet that great sum is not nearly enough. There are pending in the Pension Department one hundred thousand claims that can not be allowed by reason of technical failure of evidence. These claims are just, legal, binding, and ought to be provided for. A measure passed the Senate known as the dependent-pension bill that would have afforded relief to many thousands of these deserving heroes; that bill was sent to this House, has been considered by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and amended by ingrafting on it for these disabilities the ratings of the per diem pension of 1 cent a month pension for each day the soldier served in the Army.

Thus the soldier whose health is broken and who is dependent will, should the bill become a law, if he served sixty days, be granted a pension of 60 cents a month, $7.20 a year; if he served ninety days, 90 cents a month, $10.80 a year; if he served one hundred and eighty days, $1.80 a month, $21.60 a year; and then to complete this unique and original proposition the bill proposes to pension the widows of these unfortunate comrades at the same rate.

Can it be possible, Mr. Speaker, that we, the representatives of the people, their agents, will formulate a proposition and enact it into law that shall grant to the widow of one Union soldier a pension of $2,000 a year, to another $1,200, to another $600, to another $144, and then, running down the line I have noticed, finally reach a point where we shall give to the widow of another Union soldier the pitiful sum of $7.20 pension a year, and this in a land where equality before the law is a constitutional right guarantied every citizen of the Republic?

If a foreigner who had read the history of our country and was familiar with its fundamental principles should perchance see this list of inconsistencies, the last thought to enter his mind would be that they were American statutes. There is not in any one of these special pensions one single American principle. They are copied from English precedents, and are quite English, "you know."

Mr. Speaker, standing here as I do, a representative of the rank and file of the Union Army, and of the people of a district noted for their intelligence, their love of country, their love of justice and fair play, I desire to enter my protest against all this class legislation, because it is un-American in all its provisions and tendencies.

I am in favor of keeping all the promises made the Union soldiers. I am in favor of the most liberal pension laws, a pension now for every soldier broken in health and a service pension for every comrade after he is fifty years of age. I shall favor a pension for every soldier's widow and for the orphan children; but, Mr. Speaker, I shall insist that they be granted under the general laws where the ratings are uniform, and where, comparatively speaking, justice can be done to every pensioner. Under our theory of government there are no classes here; one life equals another life; therefore I shall vote to pension the widow of every Union soldier under the ratings of the laws of the land their husbands died to save.

Mr. BLAND. I congratulate the gentleman from Indiana, who has been a soldier himself, on the position he occupies to the private soldier in contrast to the munificence this House has constantly bestowed on those who, from their high position, were more favored in the Army. For the reasons expressed by him, as well as those I desire to advocate myself, I voted heretofore against the pensions of Mrs. Hancock, Mrs. Logan, and Mrs. Blair. If we are to continue the pensions to private soldiers and their widows, it is a matter to be considered whether we can afford to go on with these discriminations in favor of the widows of soldiers in high position, who are not pecuniarily as deserving as the widows of the poor soldiers.

Mr. Speaker, upon this pension question it would seem that Congress has no idea that any other war will ever occur in this country. It is to be hoped that none will, but all nations are subject to war. We have treaties pending now in the Senate, difficulties with foreign governments, that may result in a conflict and a serious one, and should we have another serious war the question may arise whether we can continue this pensioning system, for if we are to pension the soldiers of war after war, as they may occur, as liberally as we have pensioned those of the last war, the whole system may be broken down for the want of means of paying the pensions. Therefore, it is necessary for us to proceed with caution, and while we are all in favor of pensioning the soldier who was wounded in battle or who contracted a disease in the service, and pensioning him liberally, yet the system which prevails in this House and at the other end of the Capitol in favor of placing upon the pension-roll not only those who were wounded or diseased in the service, but all who may apply, and especially the system of singling out those who move in the aristocratic circles of society for these large bounties or gratuities, that system, if it be followed out, may not only deprive the soldiers of the last war of the pensions that are justly due them, but may result in doing injustice to the soldiers of future wars by depriving them of pensions altogether.

So, I say, it is due to the common soldier, or to the widow or dependents of the soldier who was wounded or contracted disease in the service, that we should somewhat modify this policy so as to do him justice and not imperil the pension that he deserves by granting pensions to all who seek them, and by increasing pensions, especially in these cases where the applicants have access, by reason of their standing in society, to members of Congress to whom they make appeals of this kind. I therefore, sir, have moved the amendment that is now pending, not in the hope that it will be adopted, but simply in the discharge of a duty which I felt I owed to the soldiers of the country and to the House.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CHEADLE] and the remarks of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] have been directed against pensions generally, granted under circumstances like those which surround the pending case.

The officer, whose widow this bill proposes to pension, distinguished himself in three wars, the Mexican, the Florida with the Seminole Indians, and the civil war. He rendered services to his country that I hardly have language at my command to describe. He was repeatedly promoted for gallant conduct; and, in order that the House may understand and appreciate the character of his services as a soldier, I ask the Clerk to read, first a list of his promotions, and then a list of the battles in which he participated.

The Clerk read as follows:

He was brevetted lieutenant-colonel United States Army July 21, 1861, "for gallant and meritorious services in the battle of Bull Run, Va.;" colonel United States Army June 3, 1864, "for gallant and meritorious services in the battle of Cold Harbor, Va.;" brigadier-general United States Army, March 13, 1865, "for gallant and meritorious services in the battle of Cedar Creek, Va.;" and major-general United States Army March 13, 1865, "for gallant and meritorious services in the field during the war."

He was appointed a brigadier-general of volunteers July 21, 1861, and honorably mustered out as such April 20, 1866.

He was brevetted major-general of volunteers August 1, 1864, "for gallant conduct during the war, and particularly in the battles of the campaign under General Grant, the Monocacy under General Wallace, and Opequan, Fisher's Hill, and Cedar Creek, in the Shenandoah campaign, under General Sheridan."

He joined his company at Plattsburgh Barracks, N. Y., October 1, 1839, and continued on duty with it in the Middle and Eastern States to October, 1845, in Texas to May, 1846, and in the war with Mexico, being engaged in the battle of Monterey, September 21, 23, 1846, holding of the Rinconada Pass February 22, 23, 1847, during the battle of Buena Vista, and at the capture of the city of Mexico, in August, 1847.

He left Mexico with his company and served at Fort Columbus, New York Harbor (regimental quartermaster June 15, 1849, to August 3, 1852), to November, 1860, at New Orleans, La., to March, 1852, in Florida hostilities against the Seminole Indians to October, 1852, and in Louisiana to November, 1853; on recruiting service to November, 1854; with his company in Texas to October, 1858; in Louisiana to December, 1858; in Texas to April, 1860; at Fort Monroe, Va., to April, 1861; in the defenses of Washington, D. C., to July, 1861; being in command of a light battery in the capture of Alexandria, Va., May 24, 1861; and in the Manassas campaign in July, 1861, being engaged in the battle of Bull Run July 21, 1861, where he was severely wounded and captured by the enemy, and held as a prisoner of war until January 5, 1862, when he was paroled, and in February, 1862, discharged.

From May to June 19, 1862, he commanded the First Brigade, First Division, Department of the Rappahannock; the Second Division of that department to July, 1862; the Second Division, Third Corps, Army of Virginia, to September, 1862; and the Second Division, First Corps, Army of the Potomac, to November 2, 1862, being engaged in the battle of Cedar Mountain, Va., August 9, 1862; action of Rappahannock Station, Va., August 22, 24, 1862; action of Thoroughfare Gap, August 28, 1862; battle of Manassas, August 29 to 30, 1862; battle of Chantilly, September 1, 1862; battle of South Mountain, September 14, 1862; battle of Antietam, September, 1862; and skirmish of Shepardstown, Va., September 19, 1862. He was on court-martial duty to March, 1864; in command of the Third Division, Sixth Corps, Army of the Potomac, to October, 1864, being engaged in the battle of the Wilderness, May 5, 6, 1864; battles around Spottsylvania, May 9, 21, 1864; skirmishes on North Anna, etc., May, 1864; battles and actions of Cold Harbor, June 1, 13, 1864; siege of Petersburgh, June 18 to July 6, 1864; battle of Monocacy, July 9, 1864; skirmishes at Snicker's Gap, July 18, 1864; near Berryville, Va., August 21, 1864; and Smithfield, Va., August 29, 1864; battle of Opequan, September 19, 1864; and battle of Fisher's Hill, September 22, 1864. During the battle of Cedar Creek, Va., and the morning of October 19, 1864, he assumed command of the Sixth Corps, and was severely wounded while exercising that command. He was disabled by his wounds until April 7, 1865, when he resumed command of the Third Division, Sixth Corps, and participated in the pursuit of the rebel army, terminating in the capitulation of General Lee at Appomattox Court-House.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, in addition to the distinguished services rendered by this soldier, his wife (now his widow) immediately on learning that her husband was wounded at the first battle of Bull Run, crossed the Confederate lines and went to his relief, and, while caring for her husband at that time, she also cared for other Union soldiers who had been wounded and captured and taken to Libby prison at Richmond, where she remained many months acting, as it were, in the capacity of a nurse. This fact, in connection with the distinguished services of her husband, entitles her to additional consideration.

As to the amendments that have been offered, I want to add a few words. The amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] proposes $50 a month. Of course this House will not, in a case like this, give the pittance suggested by the gentleman from Missouri—I say this with the utmost respect—nor will they, I hope, accede to the proposition to give this claimant only $75 per month. It appears of record as the amendment of the committee, but that is not exactly correct. The Committee on Invalid Pensions did at first suggest such amendment to the Senate bill, but upon a review of the case and a recital in their presence of the distinguished services rendered by this officer, and also of the services of his wife, they reconsidered their previous action and recommended to this House that the $100 per month provided for in the Senate bill should be allowed.

Mr. HATCH. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania permit a question?

Mr. RANDALL. Certainly.

Mr. HATCH. The gentleman speaks of $50 a month as a "pittance." Is it not a fact that a large number of the widows of major-generals today are receiving only $50 a month?

Mr. RANDALL. Where the necessities of a widow were involved, I have never cast an unfriendly vote——

Mr. HATCH. But is not that the fact?

Mr. RANDALL. It may be, as to a good many of them, but I have never on this floor cast a vote to restrict in that way the amount of pension allowed to a widow where the merits of the case warranted more, and I think this is one of the most remarkable and most meritorious cases in the history of our country.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I became acquainted with General Ricketts after he was wounded at Cedar Creek. The acquaintance commenced in the city of Washington. I do not believe a more gallant soldier than he ever lived. I do not believe any soldier in the Army of the United States had more opportunities or made better use of his opportunities for showing his soldier-like qualities than General Ricketts.

In reference to his widow, to whom I hope this pension will be granted, I wish to say that during the war and up almost to the present time she was ever busy in acts of kindness and humanity, more especially for the benefit of the soldiers, those who were here in Washington suffering from sickness and want.

She was for many years, as appears by the report which I hold in my hand, and as gentlemen know, the president of the visiting lady directors of the Children's Hospital of the District of Columbia. She was also for many years one of the directors of the Garfield Memorial Hospital; and the older members of this House will recall the nobleness of the woman, who so many times appeared before the proper committees of the House urging appropriations for such institutions in this city as I have mentioned.

Independently of the great services of her husband in the Army, his long service, his frequent engagements, his severe wounds, this lady herself can, through her friends, appeal justly to Congress for a pension such as this bill proposes. She was a noble, brave woman, who lived to do good.

General Ricketts died from the effects of his wounds received in the service. No one ever suffered more than he did for months from the wound received at Cedar Creek. But as soon as he was able to do so he again joined the Army and rendered distinguished service in the field until the close of the rebellion. I am sure that in voting for this pension members will all feel that they but discharge a duty to the widow of a gallant soldier.

The SPEAKER. The time for debate has expired. The first question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] to the amendment reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions. The amendment of the committee is to strike out "$100" and insert "$75." The amendment of the gentleman from Missouri is to strike out "$75" and insert "$50."

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. BLAND, it was not agreed to, there being—ayes 51, noes 78.

The amendment of the Committee on Invalid Pensions was agreed to, there being—ayes 80, noes 56.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question being on the passage of the bill,

Mr. BLAND said: Inasmuch as this is a bill in the interest of aristocracy in social circles, I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, there being—ayes 27, noes 117; less than one-fifth voting in the affirmative.

The bill was then passed.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

STATUE TO GENERAL JOHN A. LOGAN.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa, by unanimous consent, presented a memorial of the Society of the Army of the Tennessee and the Grand Army of the Republic, in favor of the passage by Congress of the joint resolution authorizing the erection of a statue to Maj. Gen. John A. Logan in Iowa Circle, Washington, D. C.; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD. It is as follows:

APRIL 19, 1888.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

The undersigned petitioners wish respectfully to bring to your attention the fact that, at the annual meeting of the Society of the Army of the Tennessee held at Detroit, Mich., September 14 and 15, 1887, the subject of the death of Maj. Gen. John A. Logan was duly considered, and amongst other resolutions the following were unanimously adopted by the society:

"Resolved, That in the opinion of this society it would be fitting that a suitable statue should be erected at the national capital in some public place to commemorate the great services in war and peace rendered by Maj. Gen. John A. Logan to the country, and this society proposes to co-operate with the Grand Army of the Republic and other organizations and citizens in general in raising the necessary funds and securing suitable legislation by Congress to accomplish the proposed end.

"Resolved, therefore, That a committee of five be appointed for the above purpose, and said committee is hereby authorized to fill vacancies in its own body, to appoint other committees, and to co-operate with committees appointed by other organizations or bodies of citizens to raise funds and to take such action from time to time as they may deem necessary and proper to secure the erection of a statue of General Logan as above proposed."

In pursuance of the above resolutions and for the purpose of carrying out the recommendations therein made the following-named persons were appointed a committee on behalf of said society: Green B. Raum, M. D. Leggett, D. B. Henderson, John McNulta, and W. H. Calkins.

We also wish to bring to your attention the further fact that the National Encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic, held at St. Louis, Mo., on the 27th, 28th, 29th, and 30th days of September, 1887, in considering the subject of the death of General Logan, among other resolutions, unanimously adopted the following:

"Your committee, to whom was referred the matter of co-operating with the trustees appointed by the Legislature of the State of Illinois at its last session to erect, in one of its parks of Chicago, a monument to that illustrious comrade and statesman, Maj. Gen. John A. Logan, and to whom also have been referred the resolutions of the Society of the Army of the Tennessee, adopted at its annual meeting held in the city of Detroit on the 14th and 15th instants, asking that the Grand Army of the Republic co-operate with said society in erecting a suitable monument at the nation's capital in honor of that great comrade, beg leave to submit the following:

We do not deem it wise at this time to ask the Grand Army to aid in erecting two monuments to General Logan, much as we would wish to do so, fearing that the double undertaking would weaken if not defeat both. And inasmuch as the great State of Illinois has so nobly begun the work in Chicago, and nothing has as yet been done towards the statue in Washington, we believe it wise to use all our own energies in erecting the latter.

We therefore, believing every comrade in the United States will wish to join in this work, recommend that the Grand Army, through its several departments and posts, be earnestly requested to at once raise the small sum of 10 cents from each of its members for said object, and that a permanent committee of five be appointed by this body, with power to fill vacancies, whose duty it shall be to co-operate with the committee of five, appointed by said Society of the Army of the Tennessee, to carry on and complete the work of erecting this statue in Washington. We recommend that all sums so collected shall be transmitted through department and national headquarters to said committee, with a roster of all the names of comrades who shall contribute to said fund, that the latter may be preserved in the archives of the society having in charge this noble work.

And in pursuance of said resolutions a committee was appointed to represent the Grand Army of the Republic, consisting of the following-named persons: R. A. Alger, Hannibal Hamlin, James A. Beaver, John M. Palmer, and H. H. Thomas.

Your petitioners are of the opinion that the action of these two societies looking to the erection of an equestrian statue in the city of Washington to General Logan will meet with the hearty approval of the people of the United States.

The undersigned petitioners, committees of the societies above named, propose, with the sanction of Congress, to raise the necessary funds and to erect a suitable equestrian statute to General Logan at the national capital. To the end that this may be done, your petitioners respectfully pray that your honorable bodies will pass a joint resolution authorizing the erection of such a statue at the crossing of Vermont and Rhode Island avenues and P and Thirteenth streets in the reservation known as Iowa Circle in the city of Washington, D. C.; that a suitable number of condemned cannon be donated by Congress for the metal for this work, and that a proper appropriation be made for the erection of a pedestal for said statue. This action we respectfully urge upon Congress as a fitting tribute of the country to a man who is universally recognized as the foremost volunteer soldier of the Union Army during the late civil war. The action we ask of Congress in this case is similar to the action of Congress for the erection of the statues to those distinguished soldiers, General McPherson and General Thomas.

Washington, D. C., January 16, 17, 18, 1888.

[Extracts from Minutes.]

Hon. Orlando B. Potter, chairman of the committee on resolutions, presented the following resolutions to the convention:

Whereas the decay of American shipping demands the adoption of prompt and efficient measures for its restoration to strength and prosperity: Therefore be it

Resolved, That in the opinion of this convention the passage of the following bill by Congress will promptly restore our ocean commerce and naval power:

THE TONNAGE BILL.

Be it enacted, etc., That on and after the passage of this act there shall be paid, out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to any vessel, whether sail or steam, built and owned wholly in the United States, engaged in the foreign trade, the sum of 30 cents per registered ton for each 1,000 miles sailed, and pro rata for any distance traveled less than 1,000 miles on any voyage or voyages between this and any foreign country or countries, and the measure of distance traveled, and the distance between ports or places in this country and ports or places in foreign countries, and between one foreign port or place and another foreign port or place, and from any designated point of longitude or latitude to any port or place in this country or any foreign country, shall be determined by measurements which shall be furnished by the United States Hydrographic Office to the Bureau of Navigation; and such payments to any vessel as aforesaid shall be paid on the vessel's arrival at a port of entry in the United States, in accordance with such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prepare and promulgate. The payment at the rate of 30 cents per ton for each 1,000 miles sailed, as herein provided to be paid to vessels engaged in the foreign trade, shall continue for the term of ten years, and thereafter for another term of nine years at a reduction of 3 cents per ton each year upon each 1,000 miles sailed, and pro rata for any less distances.

Resolved, That this convention further urge upon Congress the immediate provision for the defense of the coast and seaport cities of the United States on the lakes as well as on the seaboard.

Resolved, That this convention further urge upon Congress the rebuilding and equipment of a strong, efficient navy, not only for maritime defense, but for the security of our commerce and carrying trade on the high seas.

Resolved, That this convention further urge upon Congress the adequate and progressive provision for the improvement of harbors and rivers of the whole country concurrently with the restoration and development of our ocean commerce, so that all sections and States of the Republic shall participate in and enjoy the benefits of restored and enlarged commerce with each other and the outside world through the natural water ways and harbors, developed by the fostering hand of the nation.

Resolved, That the United States mails ought to be carried between this and foreign countries in American ships, under our own flag, as soon as practicable, consistently with certainty and celerity of the service, and that for such service the Government ought to pay just and adequate compensation, regardless of the price at which other nations are willing, for this, a foreign service.

Resolved, That the vast and prospective manufacturing and commercial interests of this country entitle them to a foreign mail service, the promptness, celerity, and certainty of which shall be insured, in peace and in war, by national patriotism, national pride, and national ambition to extend our influence, our commerce, and our markets throughout the world.

Resolved, That such service can only be relied upon, in peace and in war, from American hands, warmed by American hearts, under the American flag.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This being the fourth Monday of the month, business from the Committee on the District of Columbia is now in order, if the time be claimed by that committee.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Speaker, the unfinished business at the adjournment on the last District day was House bill No. 5042, known as the bill for the promotion of anatomical science. I ask that the bill be passed over for the present without losing its place on the Calendar.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

POLICE FORCE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HEMPHILL. The bill which I next desire to call up is in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I therefore move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6677) to amend an act entitled "An act to increase the police force of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved January 31, 1883, and for other purposes.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Against that bill, I desire to raise the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER. This bill is in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the question can not be presented in that form. The House may refuse to consider the bill by disagreeing to the motion to go into Committee of the Whole for that purpose.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I hope that motion will not be adopted.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. HEMPHILL, there were—ayes 42, noes 85.

Mr. SOWDEN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, there being—ayes 30, noes 116; more than one-fifth voting in the affirmative.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. HEMPHILL; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 55, nays 166, not voting 103; as follows:

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Speaker, I now call up the bill S. 1938.
The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.
The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1938) making an additional appropriation for the relief of the poor of the District of Columbia.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I raise the question of consideration against that bill.

The SPEAKER. This bill, the Chair is advised, is also in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the only way to reach the object the gentleman from Louisiana has in view is to vote down the motion to go into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I desire to make a brief statement, with the consent of the House.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I hope the motion to go into Committee of the Whole will be voted down.

Mr. HEMPHILL. My motion is to go into Committee of the Whole, but I wish to make a brief statement, if the House will give consent, before the vote is taken.

The SPEAKER. The question is not debatable; but if there be no objection the gentleman from South Carolina will be permitted to make a brief statement.

There was no objection.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Speaker, the object of my motion is, of course, to test the sense of the House as to whether or not it will go on with the District of Columbia business on this day, it having been assigned to us for that purpose under the rules. We have already been cut out of one day by the dead-lock, for which the District Committee was in no wise responsible. There is a large accumulation of business on the Calendars from that committee; and I do not know of any people who need legislation more than the people of the District of Columbia. Of course, however, if the House by a majority vote sees proper to determine that it will not take up the District business to-day, I can only submit gracefully.

I make this statement in order that the House may know that I will consider this as a test vote whether or not they will proceed with the District business.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. HEMPHILL, there were, on a division—ayes 34, noes 87.

Mr. SOWDEN. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I trust we will not have a yea-and-nay vote, as the sense of the House is evidently against us. It will do no good, and I hope the time will not be taken up.

Mr. SOWDEN. I will withdraw the demand for the yeas and nays.

So (no further count being demanded) the motion was not agreed to.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, my purpose being to further consider the river and harbor bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. MCMILLIN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the bill the title of which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9050) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. CRAIN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the paragraph which the House had reached when the committee rose and the House adjourned on Saturday.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 238 and 239 of the bill strike out "100" and insert "150;" so it will read $150,000.

Mr. CRAIN. This, the committee will remember, is the provision for the improvement of Aransas Pass, in Texas. The amount proposed by the amendment is $15,000 less than the amount which was recommended by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors in the bill of last year, which failed to become a law. If my memory in that respect is incorrect I trust the chairman of the committee will correct me. It is stated that this bill is large in the aggregate because it is really and substantially a bill making appropriations for two years. If so, all the better reason why the recommendation of the committee of $165,000 in the bill of the last session of Congress should not be reduced to $100,000 in this bill.

When I offered an amendment on Saturday to this paragraph, increasing the amount to that which was recommended by the Chief of Engineers, I simply asked a favorable consideration for it at the hands of the Committee of the Whole. My colleague [Mr. STEWART] who represents an adjoining district in this Congress, and who is a member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, took occasion to indirectly oppose this amendment, if I understand from the language which he employed in its discussion. I desire to say to him, and in presence of the committee, that in offering the amendment I did not intend to reflect either directly or indirectly upon him. I am satisfied that he did everything in his power, that he did everything that he could conscientiously do in the Committee on Rivers and Harbors to secure for every place along the coast of Texas the largest possible amount of the appropriations, but at the same time I saw no objection to my acting as his coadjutor in the Committee of the Whole, and asking the increase of the appropriation which was contained in the proposition I then submitted.

I have now reduced the amount which I then asked the committee to appropriate, from $200,000, which was the entire amount proposed by the Chief Engineer, to $150,000, which, as I said at the outset of my remarks, is $15,000 less than was appropriated in the bill which failed to become a law in the last session. In support of the amendment I ask that the Clerk read a communication addressed to me, upon this subject of the improvement of Aransas Pass, from a gentleman who was in local charge of the harbor improvement and represented the Government under a contract for that improvement.

ARANSAS PASS, TEX., March 30, 1888.

SIR: I have been for years in local charge of the harbor improvement conducted by the United States Government at this pass and am at present inspecting agent for the Government while the work is being carried on under contract. I am perfectly familiar with all things pertaining to the pass and its improvement. I have made the winds and tides and currents, with their effects, a study, and have carefully noted the result of all work done. In short, sir, I have been right on the ground here as agent for the Government, giving my whole time and attention to this work, and have gained so much of the confidence of all persons interested in this work that they have appealed to me to address you, calling your attention to the smallness of amount of money recommended by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors for the improvement of this pass, asking you to call to your aid our respected Senators and your colleagues who are interested, or who represent a constituency who are interested in this work, and exert all your powers to have the amount increased every dollar possible.

Our people have come to realize that deep water on Aransas Bar is a matter of vital importance to them, as the development of the country depends entirely upon it. They see bright prospects ahead in the tide of immigration tending toward this part of Texas, and in the many capitalists seeking advantageous investments.

The United States Government should give to the State of Texas at least one deep-water port in the interest of her great commerce. It should give to the navigators of the world one deep water on the coast of Texas as a harbor of refuge. There is not a port on the coast of this great State in which a deep-sea vessel can seek safety in distress. With these considerations in view, I suggest that our Representatives make a study of the results already obtained by the money expended here. The reports of the United States engineers show that the results promised were very nearly obtained under most unfavorable circumstances, and will satisfy any observing person that had the amounts they recommended as asked for been appropriated, those results would have been realized. This bar was deepened, by Government work, from 6 feet in 1879 to 10½ feet—both at mean low tide—in 1884, and that depth was maintained until appropriations ceased and work suspended.

The present officer in charge has renewed operations with the appropriation of 1886, which will soon be expended in repairing damage during delay, and all interested citizens of Southwest Texas pray to the honorable members of Congress to appropriate and place in his hands sufficient funds to enable him to carry his projects to a speedy and successful issue.

The $100,000 recommended by the committee should be increased to $200,000, but even $150,000 would enable the engineers to make such a showing that their estimates and reports would demand more attention than ever before.

You will observe, sir, that I do not address you by virtue of my position, but as a citizen, by request of my fellow-citizens on account of my long acquaintance with the work and thorough knowledge of the bar and pass.

Your , most respectfully,

C. H. BUTTS,
Rockport, Tex.

HON. W. H. CRAIN, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BLANCHARD. I yield to the gentleman from Texas, who wishes to be heard further.

Mr. CRAIN. As I stated at the beginning, in offering this amendment I was not certain as to the amount which had been recommended by the last bill; but I called upon the chairman of the committee to state whether my recollection was correct or not. While the communication was being read he handed me a copy of the bill, and I discover now that I was in error. The amount appropriated by that river and harbor bill was $101,250, instead of $165,000.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Will the gentleman allow a correction?

Mr. CRAIN. Certainly.

Mr. BLANCHARD. To this extent: The Committee on Rivers and Harbors in the first session of the Forty-ninth Congress recommended more for Aransas Pass than the amount there stated; but the Senate cut it down, and it was finally reduced in that manner to the $101,000 the gentleman finds in the bill.

Mr. CRAIN. My statement, then, as to the action of the House is correct.

Mr. BLANCHARD. The appropriation was larger than this, but the Senate reduced it.

Mr. STEWART, of Texas. I wish to say a word in reply to the statement of my colleague that on last Saturday I opposed his amendment. I deny that I gave any opposition to it, and I am not willing that the RECORD should show by the remark of my colleague that I made any opposition.

As every member of the House who was present knows, what I said was that I felt called upon, as a member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, in vindication of my course as a member of the committee, to state the rule adopted by the committee in making appropriations. I stated we had to be governed by the reports of the engineers in charge of the work, and that notwithstanding more than a million of dollars was recommended by the officer in charge of the work, that estimate by the Chief of Engineers was cut down to $200,000. But the rule we had adopted was to give from 40 to 50 per cent. of the estimate of the Chief of Engineers. In this instance we gave 50 per cent. of what was asked for the improvement of the Aransas Pass, and I, as a member of the committee, representing on that committee not only the interests of Texas but the interests of every State of this Union, could ask no more for Texas than for other States.

I undertook also on Saturday to say that so far as the amendment of my colleague was concerned I had no objection to it if the House sought to adopt it. I stand to-day as I did then, offering no opposition to his amendment, but vindicating myself as a member of the committee as regards the amount appropriated for the State of Texas.

Mr. BLANCHARD. The Committee on Rivers and Harbors is opposed to the amendment of my friend from Texas [Mr. CRAIN]. Aransas Pass is fairly treated. The estimate for the improvement there was $200,000. We give it $100,000, or 50 per cent. of the estimate. This is $50,000 less than was appropriated in the last appropriation bill.

We have given that harbor 50 per cent. of the estimate, which is a little larger than the percentage at other localities. It is true this bill is some millions larger than the bill of 1886; but it must be remembered that the present bill includes considerably more items for the improvement of rivers and harbors than did the bill of 1886.

Mr. WISE. I do not propose to detain the House more than a moment. I think it is proper to call attention to one fact which must stare every member in the face when he reads the page upon which the gentleman from Texas offers this amendment. I do not think any sectional feelings ought to govern us in making appropriations for rivers and harbors. I think each appropriation should stand upon its own merits. But I do not think all the money embraced in this bill ought to be expended in one State.

I want to call attention to the fact that on the page the gentleman's amendment is offered $975,000 are appropriated for these improvements in the State of Texas, and more than half of that $975,000 is expended or to be expended in the district represented by my friend from Texas. I do not think he has any reason to complain of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors or of his colleague on that committee, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEWART].

Mr. CRAIN. If I represent a district which ought to be improved, should not the money be spent there?

Mr. WISE. You have got one-twentieth of the whole bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CRAIN].

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. NUTTING. I desire unanimous consent to return to the items relating to New York City, which were passed over the other day. My colleagues who are interested in those items are now here.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I hope that will not be insisted upon at this time.

Mr. NUTTING. Very well; I withdraw the request.

Mr. CRISP. My colleague from Georgia [Mr. NORWOOD], who is unavoidably absent, has written me asking that an amendment be offered to the portion of this bill in relation to the harbor at Savannah. Unfortunately that item has been passed. I now ask unanimous consent to go back to that part of the bill that I may present the amendment which my colleague desired to offer.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I feel compelled to object. I would have to oppose the amendment if offered, and I think I will save time by now interposing an objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the next section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Brazos Santiago Harbor, Texas: Continuing improvement, $25,000.

Mr. CRAIN. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 241, strike out $25,000 and insert $100,000.

Mr. CRAIN. In support of this amendment I propose to offer some data for the consideration of the Committee of the Whole.

The lower Rio Grande Valley comprises, on the Texas side, more than 600,000 acres of splendid agricultural land, which only awaits facilities for transportation of its products to be opened up by farmers. Two crops of corn are produced annually, while it is unsurpassed, by reason of climate and grasses, for producing or breeding fine stock.

It has been demonstrated here for several years that the river-bottom lands will readily produce from 30 to 40 tons of sugar-cane per acre, each ton insuring easily 150 pounds of sugar; and the cane needs replanting only once in several years.

There is a sufficient population and enough land between Carrizo and the mouth of the Rio Grande to produce annually 50,000 bales of cotton alone on each side of the river. That would make the cotton trade alone worth $2,500,000, and it is certainly to the interest of the United States to encourage this export trade.

Cameron, Hidalgo, and Starr Counties have an area in the aggregate of 5,000,000 acres, with a population of, very likely, near 40,000. This vast territory and large population have, as yet at least, no other means of communication than over Brazos Santiago Bar.

This is the gateway to Tamaulipas, the only State in Mexico of any agricultural importance, and the great future highway into Mexico and South America, doubtless, will run within 25 miles of Brazos Santiago.

This is an important military point, and in case of trouble with Mexico, a contingency very likely to occur, a good harbor at Brazos Santiago would be of inestimable advantage to the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CRAIN].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out this paragraph. Upon examining the report of the engineer I find that this work was inaugurated in 1881, its object being to fix the channel across the bar and deepen it. Since 1881 there have been appropriated $222,500 for this work, exclusive of $6,000 appropriated in 1878, to remove a wreck. The work has been going on for six or seven years, and the sum of $185,204.17 had been expended up to July 1, 1887. The Chief of Engineers, in his report, uses this language:

The total amount expended to June 30, 1887, is $185,204.17, including outstanding liabilities. It has not as yet resulted in any useful effect upon the bar.

This sum of nearly $200,000, after seven years of experimenting, has resulted, by the admission of the engineer, in absolutely no good whatever, and a scheme is now on foot to change the system of carrying on the work. Lieut. George A. Zenn, with a corps of engineers and a party, was sent out from Galveston on June 24, 1887, to procure information required as a basis upon which to project a new plan of improvement.

Mr. STEWART, of Texas. Will the gentleman please state what are the lines of the bill he proposes to strike out?

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. Lines 240 and 241. Mr. Chairman, both the Chief Engineer and the engineer in charge state in their reports that no reliable estimate of the amount of money can be made until the information now being sought is obtained. Here, then, is a work begun in 1881 which it was estimated by the engineers would cost $678,084.50 to complete. They had figured down even to the exact number of cents that would be required to construct the work; but after six or seven years of experimenting, and the expenditure of $185,000, it stands admitted by the engineers themselves that the work is a failure and that no further progress will be made in it until reports are obtained from the engineers who were sent out from Galveston in June last to survey and examine the bar and ascertain what system is best adapted to its improvement.

Mr. SOWDEN was recognized, and yielded his time to Mr. STONE, of Missouri.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the House to the money statement made by the engineers. The act of 1886 appropriated $37,500 for this work, and at that time there was on hand, coming over from previous appropriations, $336.28, making a total amount on hand of $37,836.28 on August 5, 1886, the date of the approval of the act.

Since that time only $540.45 have been expended, including outstanding liabilities, leaving on hand on July 1, 1887, $37,295.83. In 1886, I say, we appropriated $37,500 for this work, and at last accounts we still had on hand over $37,000 of that money, with no definite plan determined upon for its expenditure, and with a surveying party sent out to examine the harbor and ascertain what work was necessary and to report a plan of improvement. It seems to me, sir, that, with the entire appropriation of 1886 on hand at the beginning of this fiscal year, under the conditions stated, this additional appropriation is wholly unnecessary, and it swells the aggregate of this enormous appropriation bill for which this House, if it passes, will be criticised and condemned.

I move to strike out the item.

Mr. STEWART, of Texas. Mr. Chairman, Brazos Santiago is at the mouth of the Rio Grande River. It is the only outlet to the sea for the extreme western portion of Texas, and the gentleman will observe that in this instance the Committee on Rivers and Harbors departed from their rule and allowed only 25 per cent. of the amount recommended by the engineer. The amount recommended by the engineer, notwithstanding the fact that a surveying party was out, was $100,000, and, because of the fact that this was a river and harbor bill for two years instead of for one, last year's bill having failed to become a law for want of the signature of the President, we thought we would give $25,000 upon the recommendation of the engineer in charge of the work that $100,000 was needed, thinking and feeling as we did and do that that was a proper appropriation to be made and that the amount on hand would be very small considering the difficulties and obstacles to navigation at that point. I think that we did right in that. I think this sum ought to be left in the bill, and, in fact, I have no objection to the amendment offered by my colleague [Mr. CRAIN], but because of the report to which I have referred, we departed from our rule in this instance and allowed only 25 per cent. of the amount recommended by the engineer, which, added to the amount now on hand, considering the fact that they have had no appropriation now for two years, is but a very meager sum for the benefit of the commercial interests involved in this improvement.

Mr. BLANCHARD. In addition to what has been said by the gentleman from Texas, I will merely say that Brownsville, which is the town at Brazos Santiago, and is connected directly with it, has some six or seven thousand people. There is a custom-house located there; a regular line of Morgan steam-ships plies between Brazos Santiago and Galveston. Besides that, a number of schooners and sloops enter there, and very considerable commerce is carried on in that way. The collections of revenue there amount to $32,500 a year more than this appropriation of $25,000. The appropriation for Brazos Santiago, therefore, is amply warranted by the facts of the case.

The question being taken, the amendment of Mr. STONE, of Missouri, was not agreed to.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. I move now to amend by striking out "$25,000" and inserting "$10,000."

In reply to my friend from Texas, who says that the engineers recommended an appropriation of $100,000 and that the Committee on Rivers and Harbors reduced that estimate to $25,000, I wish to say, with all due respect to the opinion of the engineers, that I am really unable to understand how they could make any intelligent estimate of the amount of money required for a given improvement until they had first determined what the improvement was to be. This estimate was made within a week after the surveying party was sent out to Brazos Santiago and before any report whatever had been received from them.

My friend from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD] talks about the commerce at that harbor. I hold in my hand a report embracing the commercial statistics of Brazos Santiago. Instead of there being a very extensive line of Morgan steamers coming in and out of that place, this report says:

There enters and clears about once every ten or twelve days during the year a Morgan line steamer of about 1,000 tons burden, at present the Aransas, of 678.73 tons; the following-named schooners in the lumber trade between this port and Calcasieu, La.; chiefly the George Locke, Catha, Minerva, Leman No. 3, Henrietta, Lottie Mayo, Willie, Ann, Tilly, Ida, and Quintana. They make frequent trips, say about sixty during the year, carry no passengers, and not being recorded in this district, tonnage can not be given.

What do they bring and what do they carry away in the form of freight?

They bring here cargoes of lumber, and generally take away cargoes of bones.

Here, then, is a harbor which, so far as the statistics made by interested parties show, instead of being an outlet for the immense commerce of a rich and fertile country, is visited by vessels which bring in a little lumber and take out a few dry bones—what kind of bones I do not know.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. STONE, of Missouri, it was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improvement of entrance to Galveston Harbor: Continuing improvement, $500,000.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I move to amend by striking out the last word. Mr. Chairman, this item is one of those which illustrate the characteristics of this bill, to which in my previous remarks I have called attention. Here are two items, one of $500,000 and the other of $100,000 for the harbor and the ship-channel at Galveston, Tex. I have taken occasion to look over some figures showing the appropriations made since this system of river and harbor improvements was inaugurated; and as I examined the figures I have observed the rapid upward slide in the liberality and magnificence of some of those appropriations.

This appropriation of $600,000 for the single harbor of Galveston represents a project which, as stated in the engineer's reports, involves for the harbor an ultimate expenditure in round numbers of $8,478,000, and for the ship-channel an expenditure of $813,000, making the enormous aggregate of $9,291,553 for the improvement of that port, and the appropriation proposed in this bill is but a step on that magnificent highway of expenditure which is opened up by the report of the engineers. Now, Mr. Chairman, when it is considered that the intended ultimate expenditure for the improvement of this single harbor on the Gulf aggregates almost as much as the entire amount which had been appropriated from the beginning of the Government to the year 1862 for the whole coast and interior of the Empire State of New York it seems to me we have abundant cause to look into the character of such extraordinary appropriations.

In the executive documents, showing the statistics of these improvements from the beginning of the Government, I find these suggestive figures: New York State, including all of its river and harbor improvements from the beginning of the Government, has received $10,237,000. The great State of New Jersey, with its immense coast line, with its enormous and valuable commerce, has received altogether $1,099,000; Massachusetts, $3,119,000; Maine, $1,475,000. Georgia, with its great harbors and rivers and water-courses, has received only $1,412,000 from the organization of the Government, and Illinois, with all its enormous interests of water-borne traffic, has received in the same period but $2,672,000. In other words, as I have said before, the project for the improvement of the single harbor of Galveston involves almost as much money as has been spent in the State of New York since the Government was formed, and carries more than the aggregate amount which has been expended for the improvement of rivers and harbors in New Jersey, Massachusetts, Maine, Georgia, and Illinois since the inception of the Government.

Mr. Chairman, it strikes me that these comparisons should at least cause us to pause and inquire as to the character of the operation which has been carried on at such an extraordinary expense. In the first place, we might well consider the importance of the port, the volume and extent of its business, and its relative claim on the expenditure of the Government as a great entrepot and outlet for trade and commerce.

I will not, however, go into that, because I think that in this House the relative importance of the trade, present and prospective, of Galveston, Tex., as one of the seaports of our country, is tolerably well understood. I have no desire to depreciate or belittle it, but, Mr. Chairman, it is my duty to remind the House—not to call its attention originally to the fact, because the fact has been hitherto pointed out, but to remind the House—that this enormous expenditure which is proposed in this project is not brought before us with the highest recommendation of its utility, but stands discredited by those who have been sent to represent the business and other interests of Texas on this floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will take the floor and yield my time to the gentleman from Maine.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEWART].

Mr. BOUTELLE. I hope the gentleman from Texas will allow me to go on and finish this portion of my remarks.

Mr. STEWART. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I thank the gentleman. My purpose, Mr. Chairman, is to call attention to the statements of those representative men tending to show that the project upon which it is proposed to expend this money is of doubtful character, to say the least. It has been declared on the floor of the House by eminent gentlemen, who ought to be qualified to speak in regard to the interest and the needs and the condition of that section of Texas, that this proposed work is not only not calculated to benefit the trade and commerce of Galveston, but has been up to this time an absolute waste and an actual detriment to that harbor.

I call the attention of the House to the remarks made on that subject on the 29th of January, 1885, by the Hon. Mr. REAGAN, then a Representative in this body. He was at that time advocating a different kind of expenditure—a different plan for the improvement of Galveston Harbor. He then represented a portion of Texas in this branch of Congress, and since he made that speech he has been sent to the Senate, perhaps on account of the frankness with which he denounced such proposed expenditure of the public money at that time.

He said with regard to the expenditure on these jetties for the improvement of the channel of Galveston:

> I will answer the gentleman, Mr. Chairman. For eleven years this Congress has been most liberal in its appropriation for the harbor of Galveston. It has required expenditures there to be made under the direction of the Engineer Corps of the United States. It has expended in the attempted prosecution of that work about one million and a half dollars. That money has been expended and substantially no progress has been made.

In another place he says in relation to this expenditure of money on Galveston Harbor:

> It is true a million and a half of dollars have been expended from first to last, and there is but little difference in the condition of the harbor now and when the expenditure was commenced.

But, Mr. Chairman, I do not rest my criticism of this project on what has been said of it by the gentleman who has gone to the other House. I desire to call attention to the views expressed on the same subject by a gentleman who now holds a very high representative position on the Democratic side, the present chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, a gentleman who is now at the head of a great scheme involving the reorganization of the entire commercial and manufacturing system of the country, who certainly ought to be an authority on a question of this kind in his own State. The Hon. ROGER Q. MILLS on the 31st day of January, 1885, stated as follows in regard to this proposed expenditure:

> Such was the result of the work of the United States engineers at Galveston. We are told they are men of great learning, that they have been educated at West Point by the Government; that they are learned and skillful, and all that. Their success has been precisely the same at Galveston that it was at the mouth of the Mississippi River, and precisely the same at Brownsville that it was at Galveston and at the mouth of the Mississippi River, and that is, their success is expressed by the word "failure."
> In 1874 they began the work of the improvement of Galveston Harbor by the "gabionnade" system. The engineers all expressed confidence that this system was a success. They never faltered in their devotion to it, and never wavered in their confidence of procuring what they undertook to get, that is, 18 feet of water on the bar. But in 1879 the gabionnade system was abandoned, swept away, and it has gone "where the woodbine twineth."

[Laughter.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. STEWART, of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two lines.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I hope the gentleman will not interrupt his colleague [Mr. MILLS] in the midst of his remarks.

Mr. STEWART, of Texas. I did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I say I hope the gentleman will not interrupt his colleague, but allow this quotation from his colleague's remarks to be completed.

Mr. MILLS. The gentleman need not trouble himself; the remarks are already in the RECORD.

Mr. BOUTELLE. But I want to read them again.

Mr. MILLS. Once will do.

Mr. COX. They are all right.

Mr. STEWART, of Texas. I have accorded to the gentleman from Maine all the time it is proper for me to yield; and as a member of the committee I feel that it is necessary or incumbent upon me to say something in regard to this appropriation.

Mr. Chairman, before addressing myself to the question before the committee I desire to express my sincere regret that anything like sectionalism should have been brought into a discussion of this bill. I stated, on a former occasion during this discussion, that in considering places where the public money was to be appropriated for such improvements we were not governed by State limits or State lines; but we conceived that the only jurisdiction Congress had over the matter was because of the fact that these ports belonged to the United States, and we gave consideration to the improvement of these different places for which we have appropriated money, not because they happened to be embraced within the limits of a State, but because they were harbors that belonged to this great Government, and this Government was appropriating money for the improvement of them.

I stated also on a former occasion that before the committee attempted to deal with these subjects we found it necessary to be governed by some sort of rule. What better rule, I ask, could we have adopted than the reports of the different officers of the Government on these various works and in charge of them? We adopted, as a means of guiding us in the appropriations we made, these reports; and, as I have stated, whilst it was not a rule to which we adhered in all cases and at all times, we did most generally adhere to that rule of giving from 40 to 50 per cent. of the appropriations demanded for the improvement of these different points.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in regard to Galveston. This is the great commercial emporium of the great State of Texas. It is the largest city in our State; and if results commensurate with the amount of money expended there have not been obtained, it is not due altogether to the obstacles to the improvement of the navigation at Galveston, nor should I say that it is due to the ignorance or inefficiency of the officers who had the work in charge. Every one who has familiarized himself with jetty works must know that they are somewhat tentative in their character; and that the engineers, from the experience gained in the prosecution of the work, and from the result of the tides upon the works themselves, have often been compelled to change their plans, for sometimes these plans have failed.

This, I admit, is the misfortune at Galveston. A large amount of money was appropriated, which resulted in no practical benefit. But in 1882 the jetty works were commenced there, after a survey by a board of competent engineers of the United States Army. Unfortunately they adopted the mattress system, and the mattresses were destroyed by the teredo; and, perhaps, there was subsidence of the mattresses themselves because of the weight placed upon them. In view of the experience of the past the plan has been changed again, and instead of using wooden mattresses, subject to the attacks of the teredo, they use stone and granite; and the recommendation made by the officer in charge at Galveston for the necessary works on this plan was $3,000,000. The Chief Engineer saw proper to cut that estimate down to $1,000,000; and we, adhering to the rule that was adopted in other States, and to which I have referred, gave 50 per cent. of the amount recommended by the Chief Engineer.

Mr. Chairman, there is no more important work in this whole country than the improvement of the harbor of Galveston.

Mr. CULBERSON was recognized, and yielded his time to Mr. STEWART.

Mr. STEWART, of Texas. Without going into a detailed statement of the work that has been done there, let me say to the committee that there are two projects: One to extend these sea-walls out to and across the bar, which, it is believed, and the engineer so expresses the opinion, will give 18 feet of water. By extending them farther a depth of 30 feet of water can be obtained. To accomplish the first will require $3,000,000, but by the second plan it is estimated that $7,000,000 would be required.

Galveston is one of the chief cotton ports of the United States. It has a very large and steadily increasing trade. The Engineer's Report shows that there is commerce there amounting annually to some $73,000,000. There is a tonnage there of 250 steam-vessels and more than 296 sail vessels that enter and depart from that port annually. The tonnage amounts to 448,801. And back of this port is the great State of Texas with its immense resources, with a population now of perhaps two and one-half millions of people, continually increasing in number, in property, in products, in wealth, and the chief seaport for that great State is this city of Galveston. But not only is Texas, great as is the empire of that State, benefited, but I say that all the country lying between the Mississippi River and the Rocky Mountains is directly interested in the improvement of this harbor; for the time is not far distant, if there be proper legislation upon the part of Congress, when we will have the trade not only of Mexico, but of all the States of Central and South America; and when that is done it is not within the power of the human mind to conceive of the amount of commerce that will pass through this outlet at Galveston. The West is directly interested. The whole country is interested in the project.

I remember well, sir—I believe it was in the Forty-eighth Congress—when a Representative from Galveston attempted to have stricken from the appropriation bill the amount set apart for that port, in order that this improvement might be under private contract, when the honorable senior member of this House, Judge KELLEY, of Pennsylvania, rose in his place and objected, saying that Galveston did not belong to Texas, but to the whole country; that it was a port of the United States, and not of Texas alone.

I appeal to the members of this House to let this appropriation remain undisturbed. This is only half what the Chief of Engineers asks. By that amount great good will be done. It will deliver Galveston and the State of Texas in a measure from the control of the railroads in that State. [Applause.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. I do not think the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEWART] could have understood me when he thought that I was looking at this proposition from any sectional standpoint. There was nothing sectional in my remarks. They were entirely practical. When he interrupted me I was about to read the remarks of the distinguished senior Representative from Texas [Mr. MILLS], to show that in his opinion this was a useless expenditure of money. I will continue my reading from that point. Mr. MILLS says:

But in 1879 the gabionnade system was abandoned, swept away, and it has gone "where the woodbine twineth." It has gone out into the wide sea, and the $527,000 expended by the Government to make a channel by the gabionnade system has been sunk in the depths of the sea. In 1879 the mattress system was adopted. A jetty 4¼ miles in length was constructed at a cost of $975,000, including $100,000 contributed by the city of Galveston. The total amount expended up to the present is $1,578,000. That single jetty was to perform wonders, and it did perform wonders. There is something strange about it to one who does not comprehend fully the science of engineering. It deepened the water. There is no doubt about that, for the engineers tell us so in their report. But it deepened it on the wrong side of the jetty.

It was the design of the engineers that the channel should be on the north side of the jetty, but the water refused, and cut the channel on the south side. The engineers designed that the south side should be shoaled, but the water determined to shoal the north side, and they cut a channel from 4 to 8 feet deep on the south side. The water was 12 feet deep on the bar when the work began in 1874. In September, 1875, a heavy storm came and plowed out a channel 9 inches deep. Now they have 13 feet of water, and there is 3 inches of that 13 feet involved in a contest between the engineers and the clerk of the weather as to who is entitled to claim it.

In addition to the grand success of getting a channel on the wrong side of the jetty, they have turned the current of the Gulf along the shore of the island, which is cutting it away and threatening the permanent destruction of that part of the island and the submerging of houses along with the jetty in the waters of the Gulf. Such have been the achievements of our engineers. The people of Texas have no confidence in obtaining deep water under their plans, and they look for success only by the adoption of the plans of Eads at the mouth of the Mississippi, and that is by raised jetties, confining the outflow to the channel and making it do the dredging.

Mr. CRAIN. When was that?

Mr. BOUTELLE. Does the gentleman ask when this speech was delivered?

Mr. CRAIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I have been reading from the speech of Mr. MILLS, on the 31st of January, 1885.

I say, as I said before, that every word of that criticism, which was justly applied to the work going on at Galveston at that time, applies as justly to the work going on to-day. And it does seem to me that this testimony, so emphatic, so unqualified, coming from so high a source, declaring that not only does this work fail to produce the result desired but that it has produced damage and is fast destroying the commerce of that great commercial emporium which my friend has depicted in such glowing colors, the realization of which I should be very happy to see.

I say, in view of the fact that the House is advised up to this time by the men best qualified, or who ought to be best qualified, to speak as to the work carried on at that point, that the expenditure is extravagant, is wasteful, is worse than useless, is destructive: it does seem to me that Congress ought to pause before going forward with an expenditure which in the aggregate is to involve not only this outlay of $9,291,000 for this one port, but is also to involve, if these statements are true, the probability of seriously if not permanently injuring the harbor of Galveston.

Mr. BAYNE. When the proposition of Captain Eads was made to improve the harbor of Galveston I opposed it with all the energy and ability I had at command. I felt very certain it would not prove a successful scheme for the improvement of that harbor. It was a wonderful measure, which handed over really to Captain Eads between eight and nine million dollars without responsibility and without a bond, and enabled him to go to work and improve that harbor in his own way and according to a plan which had not yet been devised. When he appeared before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House and was questioned as to his plans he said he proposed to place the jetties from one to two thousand feet apart, and from that time on I believe the conclusion of the engineers all over the country, and the common sense of Americans everywhere, was that the scheme, if it had been undertaken, would have proved an absolute failure. Congress was happily delivered from that grievous mistake by the opposition made to the measure in the House of Representatives. The able Representative from the State of Texas [Mr. STEWART] had no confidence in it, and was one of those who opposed it. Before that time various schemes for the improvement of the harbor at Galveston had been undertaken, and almost every scheme proposed and put partially in practice had proved a failure. But the appropriation on this bill is on a different basis. A board of engineers went there, examined the harbor, ascertained the difficulties in the way, and have devised a scheme for the improvement of the harbor of Galveston, which I believe is going to be as successful as any scheme which can be devised for any harbor similarly situated and having similar characteristics.

It appears to be admitted by the board which has recommended this scheme that there will always be more or less dredging required in that harbor to keep the channel open. I think that is correct; but notwithstanding the fact that no scheme is possible which will enable that harbor to clear its own channel, and notwithstanding the fact that dredging will always be necessary in order to keep an open channel-way there, I think every patriotic man throughout the entire country will admit that that harbor, with its great commerce, should be afforded the best facilities possible, and should have liberal appropriations made for its improvement by the Congress of the United States. That was the feeling of the Committee on Rivers and Harbor, and after having had this scheme submitted to them, after having examined it as critically as they knew how, and after having compared it with those that had gone before, the committee felt satisfied that it was proper to make this appropriation for that harbor. I think that if my friend from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] understood the situation as fully as the Committee on Rivers and Harbors do, he would not hesitate to vote for the appropriation, and he certainly would not interpose against the scheme, under which the Engineer Department is now working, objections which were made to a prior and entirely different scheme.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Do I understand my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] to differ with the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. BAYNE. The gentleman from Texas, Mr. MILLS. At that time, unfortunately, there were a number of persons who favored the Eads scheme.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I am not speaking of the arguments in favor of the Eads scheme, but of the arguments against the other scheme. Did you approve of that?

Mr. BAYNE. No, sir.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I thought you did.

Mr. CRAIN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] said that he did not propose to discuss this from a sectional standpoint, and yet he, representing a prohibition district, proposes to deprive my district of water. [Laughter.] If that is not sectional I do not know what is. Whatever may have been said three or four years ago by my colleague, Mr. MILLS, or by Mr. REAGAN, with reference to the scheme that was then pending for the improvement of this harbor, it does not apply to the scheme that has now been adopted under the auspices of the Chief of Engineers himself, who was one of the board of survey that condemned the very scheme which the gentleman from Maine condemns.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I do not condemn it. The gentleman from Texas condemns it. Now, will the gentleman [Mr. CRAIN] make it clear what change has been made?

Mr. CRAIN. Yes, sir. In the first place the original plan contemplated submerged jetties. In the next place it contemplated walls built of mattresses and of rock. It was discovered, however, that in the Gulf there is a marine insect, called the teredo, which destroyed these mattresses, and, as a result, the work done under that scheme deteriorated whenever the appropriations failed to pass the House or whenever the meager appropriations doled out were used up by the engineers in charge.

Mr. BOUTELLE. When did the engineers of the United States discover that there was a teredo in the waters of Texas?

Mr. CRAIN. Several years ago, when this board of survey was appointed to go down there and make a survey.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I thought that discovery was a very old one.

Mr. CRAIN. Under the new plan the jetties are built up at least 5 feet above high-water mark. They are constructed not of wooden mattresses, which are subject to the ravages of the teredo; they are built of solid masonry, sometimes concrete, sometimes large blocks of stone. They are 7,500 feet apart, instead of being, as I believe the others were, 10,000 feet apart. In addition to that, as was suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE], it is contemplated to do such dredging as may be found necessary to keep the silt in motion. Those are the distinguishing features of the two systems.

And now, Mr. Chairman, in justice to my colleague, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. MILLS], and to the former Representative here, who is now in the Senate of the United States [Mr. REAGAN], I wish to say that the very scheme which they then advocated is the scheme which is being carried out to-day, with but one difference; that is in regard to the width between the jetties. I have stated the distinguishing features of these two different schemes, the one which they condemned then, and which they would doubtless condemn now, and which has been condemned by the Government engineers under the auspices of a board of survey appointed by General John Newton, one of the members of that board being the distinguished officer who is now Chief of Engineers of the United States Army.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this amendment is exhausted. Does the gentleman from Texas withdraw his formal amendment?

Mr. CRAIN. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Maine withdraw his formal amendment?

Mr. BOUTELLE. I do. I move now to strike out the last three words.

Mr. Chairman, I notice that the only statement in contradiction of my suggestion that this present scheme is practically and substantially identical with that which met the sweeping condemnation that I have read from the speeches of Texas Representatives in the Forty-eighth Congress has come from the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CRAIN] who has more recently entered this body. I do not hear any such contradiction from the gentleman who made the criticism in 1885 or from either of his colleagues who were then on this floor.

Mr. STEWART, of Texas. If the gentleman will allow me I will say that my colleague [Mr. CRAIN] has stated the fact. It appears in the Engineer's Report that the jetties, which were originally placed 10,500 feet apart, have been changed so as to be 7,000 feet apart; and instead of being submerged jetties, according to the original project, they are now raised 5 feet above mean low tide. That is substantially the plan recommended by Captain Eads.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Then the gentleman understands that this project has been so modified as to avoid the criticisms which I have read and which were made in a previous Congress by the Representatives from Texas. I am unable to understand the matter in that way, and I do not predicate my views on scientific knowledge of my own, for I do not pretend to be a specialist in engineering or in harbor improvements; but in contradiction of the impressions of my friends from Texas [Mr. CRAIN and Mr. STEWART], who are undoubtedly sincere in believing that there has been a radical change in this project, I venture to quote from a recent report, as late as February 20, 1886, by a very distinguished engineering officer of this Government, who has had a great deal of experience in these matters of river and harbor improvements; the officer, I may say, under whose direction these improvements were carried on for many years while he occupied the position of Chief of Engineers, and a gentleman who adds to his other qualifications as a witness one which may not perhaps tend to discredit him on the other side of the House, that of being such an old-fashioned Jacksonian Democrat that it is currently reported that the mayor of New York has persuaded him to retain an important position in that city until after the Presidential election, notwithstanding the earnest desire of the President of the United States to appoint him to another high office under the Government, the position at the head of the Coast Survey. I refer to General John Newton, of the Engineer Corps, an authority that will hardly be questioned.

I do not propose to read his report in anything like its entirety; but if I can understand the English language his statements here, made more than a year after the criticism of the gentleman from Texas, are intended to be a direct refutation of those statements, a reiteration of his belief in the utility of the project then being carried out, and an assertion that the present scheme is substantially and practically a continuation of the original project. He says, speaking of this matter, that the use of concrete in place of wood was adopted as far back as 1874 and is nothing novel. He goes on:

> The parallelism of the jetties, as found in the original project of Major Howell, was, however, modified by inclining the south jetty towards the other, and by the recommendation of the board that, after carrying out the two jetties a certain distance, about half their proposed length, observations should be made with the view of changing their directions; that is, bringing them nearer together.
> The difference between low jetties and high jetties is one of degree, not of kind, though it has been industriously promulgated that their effects are diametrically opposite.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BLANCHARD. If the gentleman from Maine desires to go on, I will yield to him.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I am very much obliged to the gentleman. It will make my remarks more connected to continue them now and will not take any more time.

I was trying to show that according to General Newton's report there has been no substantial departure from the original scheme; and here on page 3 of Executive Document No. 85 (Forty-ninth Congress, first session) is a very pertinent paragraph, the significance of which is increased by a recollection of the very pointed strictures upon the United States Engineer Corps which I recently read. General Newton says:

> It will be noted that the date of this report is prior to the commencement of the south jetty by Colonel Mansfield, and this fact constitutes a sufficient answer to the reckless and false statement said to have been uttered upon the floor of Congress, that the north jetty was in condition to act when the south jetty had been finished, and that the want of success in deepening the bar proved that the plan of the engineers had been a total failure; whereas there was but one jetty, the south, the portion of the north jetty constructed having been years before the speech swallowed up in the sand.

This refers, presumably, to the speech of the gentleman from Texas, which I read.

General Newton goes on further to say in regard to the criticism that the current had cut a channel on the wrong side of the jetties:

> The trenches on either side of the jetties are not of unusual occurrence in such situations. In the present case they have been attributed to the overfall of the tides, and may be due also to the racing of the waves along the jetties.

Still further he says:

> I invite particular attention to the conclusions of the board that a great contraction of the channel by jetties would but slightly increase the velocities of the currents and extreme depth in the channel, while it would on the other hand ruin the harbor of Galveston, as well as expose the jetties to destruction.

This is as direct a contradiction of the criticisms made on the floor of the House by the Representatives from Texas as could well be put into official language; and it is made by the then Chief of Engineers, General John Newton, in vindication of his claim that the operations originally projected by the United States Engineer Corps were not subject to the criticisms which had been leveled at them in this House, and that they are continued to this day without substantial modification.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Chairman, the objection the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] has raised to this appropriation is deserving of attention. Let us examine it. The port of Galveston is one of the greatest importance. The statistics which were presented before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors show the annual commerce there is of the value of $75,000,000, and that there enter at the port five hundred and fifty vessels a year, two hundred and fifty of which are steam-vessels.

There can be, therefore, no question about the importance of this harbor. The question, then, is whether Congress is pursuing the proper course to arrive at the end desired, which is the deepening of the water in the harbor to benefit the commerce which gathers there.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] refers to the year 1885, when a certain debate took place in this House. Mr. Chairman, I was a member of the House at that time, and a member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and I participated in the action of the House which resulted in the striking out of the bill of that year a large appropriation for Galveston Harbor. The striking out of that clause of the bill had the concurrence of my judgment.

The appropriation stricken out was in continuation of a plan begun several years prior to that time. The striking out of the clause was justified by the showing made that the plan the engineers were following was not a proper one and had resulted in no good and would not result in any. To err is human, and the Engineer Corps of the United States Army is no exception to that general rule. It was shown that the course they were pursuing at Galveston was erroneous; and when the motion was made to strike out the appropriation the debate occurred from which the gentleman from Maine has quoted, and the remarks then made by the gentlemen from Texas [Messrs. MILLS and REAGAN] were in reference to the plan which was then being pursued.

Mr. BOUTELLE. By the United States engineers.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Yes; by the United States engineers. Following the striking out of that appropriation by the House there was a Board of Engineers appointed consisting of General Duane, now Chief of Engineers, Henry L. Abbot, lieutenant-colonel of engineers, and C. B. Comstock, lieutenant-colonel of engineers, who were directed to repair to Galveston and investigate the plan of improvement going on there and to report to Congress whether it was likely to achieve the end in view, namely, the deepening of the water in the harbor; and, if not, to report a plan which would increase the depth. My friend from Maine has ignored that report of the Board of Engineers.

Mr. BOUTELLE. No; it is referred to by General Newton.

Mr. BLANCHARD. You read what General Newton had to say, but you did not read from the report of the Board of Engineers which sat in judgment on the harbor since the debate took place from which you quoted.

Mr. BOUTELLE. General Newton refers to the report of that board.

Mr. BLANCHARD. The report which the gentleman read from was the report in reference to the new plan, but the debate you quoted from was a criticism on the former plan. That debate took place prior to the time of the appointment of the Board of Engineers, and prior to the adoption of the new or modified plan which they said would meet the necessities of Galveston Harbor by deepening the water to a depth of 25 or 28 feet.

Mr. Chairman, it is on this modified plan the estimates submitted to the River and Harbor Committee of the Forty-ninth and Fiftieth Congresses were based.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I will take the floor and yield my time to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. BLANCHARD. That modified plan was adopted by the Forty-ninth Congress, of which my friend from Maine was a distinguished member, by appropriating $300,000 to carry on the work under it. It thus appears, Mr. Chairman, that the appropriation of $500,000 which this bill contains is on a different plan from that criticised by Mr. MILLS and Mr. REAGAN in the Forty-eighth Congress.

My friend from Maine was certainly aware of the existence of that report of this Board of Engineers and of the modifications they had proposed. So careful were the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of this Congress in its dealings with the Galveston Harbor, so anxious were we to be certain we were right before incorporating in this bill the appropriation of a half million of dollars for that harbor, we requested the present Chief of Engineers, who, before he became chief had been a member of the board which was sent to Galveston—we requested him to appear before us, and he did so, and we examined him and cross-examined him with respect to the plan of improvement at Galveston Harbor.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. MCCREARY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1431) making an appropriation for the establishment of a light or lights and other aids to navigation to guide into Charlotte Harbor, Florida.

Also, that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the House of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. 1406) to provide for the sale of certain New York Indian lands in Kansas; and

A bill (H. R. 4964) to prevent any persons in the cities of Washington and Georgetown from making books and pools on the result of trotting or running races or boat races.

Also, that the Senate insisted on its amendment, disagreed to by the House, to the joint resolution (H. Res. 83) accepting the invitation of the French Republic to take part in an international exhibition to be held in Paris in 1889, asked a conference with the House thereon, and had appointed Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. EVARTS, and Mr. BROWN as managers on the part of the Senate.

Also, that the Senate disagreed to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 752) to grant a pension to Mrs. Elvira L. Johnson, widow of Commodore Philip C. Johnson, asked a conference with the House thereon, and had appointed Mr. SAWYER, Mr. FAULKNER, and Mr. BLAIR managers on the part of the Senate.

Also, that the Senate disagreed to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 300) granting a pension to Mrs. Juliet G. Howe, asked a conference with the House thereon, and had appointed Mr. PADDOCK, Mr. DAVIS, and Mr. TURPIE managers on the part of the Senate.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested, namely:

Joint resolution (S. R. 73) relating to the disposal of public lands in certain States; and

A bill (S. 1483) for the registry of the barges Albert M., Condor, and Adelante.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana will proceed.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Chairman, I was saying at the time the interruption took place that General Duane, Chief of Engineers, who had visited the harbor of Galveston and inspected thoroughly the works there, was before us, and we questioned and cross-questioned him with a view to ascertaining for ourselves, as far as we could, whether the plan which was being proposed there now was adequate to the end contemplated.

In the course of our examination of General Duane we asked the question whether he had any doubt that the plan of improvement would achieve the deepening of the harbor to the extent claimed by the engineers. His reply was that he did not have a doubt of it. So that we not only had the report of the engineers before us, but we took verbal testimony with respect to the improvement there; and after all that we recommended to Congress the allowance of $500,000 on an estimate of $1,000,000 to continue the work.

This is the situation, sir, and I submit it fully justifies the action of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Mr. BOUTELLE. At this point I desire to express my appreciation of the ability as well as the suavity and tact with which my friend from Louisiana, the chairman of the committee, has conducted the discussion in behalf of the bill he has in charge, and if it were not for the pride I naturally have in my political affiliations I might express regret that he had not made an appropriation out of his own liberal fund of equanimity to some of his committee colleagues on my side of the House. The gentleman and I will discuss this matter in a candid way. When he said a little while ago that I had apparently studiously failed to refer to some report on this subject I thought perhaps I had unwittingly ignored something that ought to have been considered.

I really did not know just where to look for that report. I looked up the references to this matter somewhat hastily, endeavoring to get the latest official utterances on the subject, and I find upon examination of the document to which I have already alluded, Ex. Doc. No. 85, that I was correct in the statement that General Newton's report, from which I read, is the superior officer's final condensation and revision of the subreports made by the board of officers to which the gentleman from Louisiana referred. This document contains that identical report of Colonel Duane, Lieutenant-Colonel Abbot, and Colonel Comstock to which he refers.

But that report, after being sent to headquarters, is made the subject of revision by the Chief of Engineers; and as the River and Harbor Committee, in making up their bill, have as a rule ignored in their appropriations all the recommendations made by the local engineers, and have based their action generally upon the revised estimates and conclusions of the Chief of Engineers, I felt quite justified, and do still, in quoting General Newton as expressing the sense of the board with reference to the character of the work at Galveston. His report is dated February 28, 1886. The report of the board of officers was sent to him more than a month before that.

Mr. BLANCHARD. On January 21, 1886.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Yes; January 21, 1886. So the report from which I read embodied General Newton's conclusions, after receiving the benefit of the information derived by the board sent to Galveston, and after reading the conclusions of that board he indulged in that very emphatic refutation, or denial, or protest, whatever you may please to call it, against the criticisms that had been leveled by the gentleman from Texas at the engineer officers of the United States Army in regard to their operations at Galveston, and if there is anything that he says most clearly in that report it is that the project originally designed by the Board of Engineers is being carried out to-day with only some slight modification which does not interfere with the general plan that was so severely criticised in the House in 1885.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois, was recognized, and yielded his time to Mr. BOUTELLE.

Mr. BOUTELLE. General Duane speaks of this project, saying it was adopted in 1874, modified in 1880, and again modified in 1886, the modification in 1886 being simply that slight divergence which is referred to by General Newton, and which in nowise corrects any of the evils complained of by the gentleman from Texas. And whether it is desired by the person examining this matter to sustain or condemn the plan of the Army engineers, it is not denied by any of the members from Texas in regard to the operations at Galveston, carried on for many years, in which there has been appropriated up to July of last year $1,481,000—nearly a million and a half—that up to that time the money had produced most meager, if any, favorable results. One of the piers had sunk, and General Newton himself says that one of the jetties had disappeared.

Mr. CRAIN. There never was but one there, and it is there yet. There was a gabion, which disappeared.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I read from the report of General Newton, who says "there was but one jetty, the south, the portion of the north jetty constructed having years before been swallowed up in the sand." General Newton uses the term "jetty;" and I suppose he knew what he was writing about.

But if it were true that the board to-day were proceeding on a new project; if it is also true, as alleged, that the expenditure of a million and a half dollars was discovered in 1886 to have been an absolute loss, a failure, a detriment to the harbor, I would like to know what assurance the critics of the former project can furnish in going on with this expenditure to involve $9,000,000 under the operations of the same officers whose alleged incapacity has been so vigorously denounced by gentlemen on this floor.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I will state to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] that the same officer is not down at Galveston now.

Mr. BOUTELLE. The simple change in the detail of an officer does not alter the fact that the work is under the control of the United States Engineer Corps, and the criticisms made by Texas Representatives upon this floor—which I regarded as somewhat reckless at the time—were that the United States Engineer Corps were unqualified by their training, their experience, and by the failure of their projects to carry to successful completion great works of harbor improvement of that kind.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Maine withdraw the pro forma amendment?

Mr. BOUTELLE. I do.

The Clerk read lines 244 to 246, as follows:

Improving Sabine Pass and Blue Buck Bar, Texas: Continuing improvement, $250,000.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. I move to strike out the last word.

So far as Galveston Harbor is concerned I said nothing because of the apparent necessity incumbent upon the House to proceed; but I would cheerfully vote to increase the appropriation for that harbor, because of its great importance, to the full amount asked for by the engineers.

I believe, sir, in substantial improvement, rapid improvement of the important water ways and seaports of the country, important from a commercial and national standpoint. And I would be very glad to take a large number of these wasteful and unnecessary appropriations and utilize them to some good purpose by devoting them to such an enterprise as the improvement of the harbor at Galveston.

But I want to say a word or two as to this item following the Galveston Harbor appropriation. It appropriates $250,000 for Sabine Pass.

There are two small rivers flowing down Eastern Texas and emptying into a pool called Sabine Pass or Lake, connected with the Gulf. In 1878 a project was set afoot to remove a bar so that ingress and egress might be had to the Gulf. Large amounts were also appropriated to remove obstructions at the mouths of these rivers.

In 1878 to 1880, inclusive, large sums of money were expended in dredging. In 1882 that system of improvement was abandoned and the immense expenditures upon it, it was admitted, had resulted in an absolute and total loss.

The plan adopted in 1882 was to deepen the channel by a system of jetties. It was estimated the cost would be $3,177,606.50. Since 1882 Congress has appropriated $548,750 to this work, in addition to which, as I have already stated, large amounts were appropriated to remove obstructions at the mouths of the rivers emptying into the lake.

The report of the engineer in charge of this jetty work at Sabine Pass is an interesting document. He claims to have made a foot and a half of water; but it seems the outer reaches of the jetties are being constantly destroyed by the operation of the waters of the Gulf. I read from the report of the engineer:

From 9,000 feet to 11,000 feet from shore the injury to foundation course increases, and beyond 11,000 feet, namely, from 11,000 to 16,070, the foundation course is destroyed. On this foundation course a second tier of mats 6,146 feet long and 30 feet wide was built in 1883. This tier is very little injured, excepting the top fascines, which were not covered with rock. Of the third or top tier, built in 1885, which was 6,700 feet long and 15 feet wide, 3,000 feet remains; the other 3,700 feet were broken up or moved to the sea slope of the jetty in the storm of June, 1886.

The loss in height of jetty was traced and accounted for as follows: The foundation tier invariably settled into the mud equal to the depth of the lower fascines, namely, about 5 inches. The weight of rock ballast on top, together with pounding of sea, compressed and compacted the brush after each mattress was laid, sometimes 50 per cent. of its bulk as compared with its measurement when launched, and on the outer mile of foundation course the loss is due entirely to loss of brush owing to insufficient ballast and the teredo. When the jetties were sufficiently ballasted there was practically no loss of material; the destruction of the teredo was insignificant. The compression of the brush within the mattresses when first placed must and will continue.

Mr. SOWDEN was recognized, and yielded his time to Mr. STONE, of Missouri.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. The engineer complains that the appropriations are too small to do the work efficiently. Here is what he says:

The best results in the way of obtaining deep water by jetties can only be obtained by continuously rapid work on them. Large appropriations only can accomplish good results. At the rate at which appropriations have been made for this work it will require sixteen additional years to complete the jetties as projected and approved, thus compelling a work to be twenty years in progress of construction, which, if economic considerations are to govern, should have been completed in about three years after the commencement.

One million of dollars is the amount of money that can be expended on this work in a fiscal year that will produce the best results. Whether or not there has been an increased depth of water on Sabine Pass Bar during the past five months is not definitely known. On the completion of the work this month a resurvey will be made, and the results of such survey will be forwarded as soon as known.

Mr. Chairman, if this work is to be done at all, and done efficiently, adequate appropriations should be made. As it is, it seems to be a race between the engineers and the sea, whether the one can construct faster than the other can destroy. And under what pretense, Mr. Chairman, are all these millions being poured into this maelstrom? Not to meet any existing commercial demand, because none exists, but with the uncertain and improbable hope of creating one. Sabine Pass is a seaport, but in 1886 the town was entirely destroyed by a tidal wave. There has never been any commerce there worth speaking about, and now there is absolutely none. I read again from the report of the engineer:

There has been practically no commerce at Sabine Pass the past year. The large vessels which came there brought the rock from New York for building the jetties. A few little schooners passed in and out, carrying small loads, generally to and from Beaumont and Orange, Tex. No railroad trains have run to or from the pass since the storm of last October, as about 10 miles of the roadbed was seriously damaged or destroyed, and this has not been repaired or replaced.

Vessels come there, it appears, for no other purpose but to transport rock taken from New England quarries, probably from the district of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] who is complaining about the appropriation for Galveston Harbor. They come there with cargoes of rocks to be dumped in as playthings for the sea.

It seems, then, Mr. Chairman, that there is absolutely no commerce demanding this enormous expenditure. Already over half a million dollars has been wasted in this improvement, although there is no commerce inviting it at all. But, sir, if it is necessary to make this improvement, then let us make an appropriation adequate to the demand in order that the work may not be destroyed as rapidly as it is constructed.

Mr. STEWART, of Texas. I regret very much, Mr. Chairman, the necessity which forces me before the House again, but it seems that Texas is to be attacked all along the line. [Laughter.] Heretofore I have been defending appropriations made for ports not in my own district, but in the district represented by my colleague [Mr. CRAIN]; but now I rise to defend an appropriation that is made for the only port on the Mexican Gulf that is within my district, and naturally I have some feeling about it. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. STONE] says that all the money that has been expended at Sabine Pass has been wasted, and he refers to the report of the engineer, not knowing or not remembering that that report was made for the fiscal year, which closed on the 1st of July last. Since then nearly $200,000 has been expended there, and the damage that was done to the west wall of the jetty has been repaired.

Now, if you draw a line on the map from Sabine Pass to Brazos Santiago, at the mouth of the Rio Grande, you have a distance of nearly 400 miles, and if the meanderings of the coast are counted the distance will be very nearly doubled. Along that entire line of coast there is not a harbor, with the exception of one, that will admit a vessel drawing 15 feet of water. Back of that coast is the great State of Texas, about which I talked a while ago, and I will not now repeat what I then said. The plans adopted for the improvement of the harbor at Sabine Pass are two jetty walls. One of those walls has been completed up to high tide for 13,312 feet from the shore, and the west jetty wall has been built 16,071 feet in length, and built up to high tide 7,270 feet.

The Government has already expended upon those works over a half a million of dollars. Will the gentleman from Missouri now say that the Government should stop and let what it has already expended be lost? Is that wise policy? I make the assertion now, without the fear of contradiction from any one, that no jetty works which have been built in this country, with perhaps the exception of the works at the mouth of the Mississippi River, have accomplished such great results as have been accomplished at Sabine Pass. When these works were commenced in 1882 there was scarcely 6½ feet of water on the bar; to-day there is, according to measurements in the month of February last, over 11 feet of water at low tide. This is the result of that work. You do not find it in the report of the engineer, but it is the measurement made in February last; and this result has been accomplished though not more than 50 per cent. of the scouring power of the jetties has been brought into operation because of the incomplete condition of the jetty walls. Give us the amount of money we ask for, $250,000, and I venture the assertion that when this amount is expended we shall have more than 15 feet of water at low tide.

Mr. LANHAM obtained the floor and said: I yield to my colleague [Mr. STEWART, of Texas].

Mr. BLANCHARD. I hope we shall have a vote.

Mr. STEWART, of Texas. I will not detain members more than a few moments longer.

This is the only port for Eastern Texas and that country lying east of the Trinity River, which comprises an area larger than many of the States of this Union. It is a great lumber region—a great pine country. There are saw-mills adjacent having an output of 250,000,000 feet of lumber and 80,000,000 feet of shingles. The Report on Forestry shows that tributary to this point there are over 50,000,000,000 feet of pine lumber. To-day the men who undertake to bring that lumber to market are completely in the hands of one railroad company. Give us the depth of water that we require upon that bar, and we will ship lumber to New York and all the Eastern ports, without coming in competition with any other locality, because our lumber is different from theirs; it is the long-leaf, yellow, hard pine. The improvement now going on affords the only possible outlet for the lumber of Eastern Texas and the agricultural products of that great region.

There is not a port between the mouth of the Mississippi River and Vera Cruz that affords such a harbor of refuge as does Sabine Pass; this is known to all the mariners who traverse the Mexican Gulf.

The gentleman from Missouri says there are two small rivers there. I beg the gentleman's pardon; there are two large rivers—the Neches and the Sabine—which enter into Sabine Lake. These waters find their outlet to the Gulf of Mexico through what is called Sabine Pass, a cut of about 4½ miles in length. Inside of that cut there is now a depth of from 28 to 40 feet of water. There is no obstruction except the bar, which is being rapidly removed by these jetties. When completed, this improvement will give to the country one of the very best ports on the Mexican Gulf. These being the facts, as they undeniably are—anybody acquainted with that country will verify my assertions—would the gentleman from Missouri have the Government stop now, after having expended more than half a million of dollars, and let the work which has been done deteriorate and go to decay? With these facts before the House, I do not think it necessary to occupy further time.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, in answer to my friend from Texas I desire to say that the remarks which I submitted were predicated upon the report made by the engineer. The information which the gentleman now furnishes was not in my possession. Looking to that report alone, I found that this work was falling to pieces about as rapidly as it was being built.

My friend says that we have spent half a million of dollars there already, and he asks whether it is wise to abandon that work. Certainly not, if there is any commercial demand for the work itself. One of the evils of this system of river and harbor improvements is that, inspired by local influences, we inaugurate enterprises which have no great national or commercial importance; and when a few thousand dollars have been sunk in them we are asked, "Is it wise or politic or good business policy, after this work has been done, to abandon it? Is it not best to go on with it?" Perhaps, in this instance, after the explanations made by my friend, it is best to continue the work. He says that a large commerce comes down these rivers and passes out to the Gulf. I do not know anything about it; my remarks were based upon such information as I gathered from the report of the engineers themselves. This report distinctly says that during the past year there was practically no commerce there, and that the town of Sabine Pass was destroyed in 1886. It has not been rebuilt, as I am informed.

Mr. STEWART, of Texas. That is not true.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. Does the gentleman mean to say the town has been rebuilt?

Mr. STEWART, of Texas. I want to correct the gentleman's statement in this way. There was an unprecedented storm at Sabine Pass in October of the year the gentleman mentions; but the town was not destroyed; no substantial building in the town suffered any injury; some little board shanties were destroyed.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. I am sorry my friend——

Mr. STEWART, of Texas. I know whereof I affirm.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. I accept the gentleman's statement as unquestionably correct; but I was misled by this report, which says:

The water is credibly reported to have reached a height of 8 feet above the ground on which the town of Sabine Pass stood. In less than an hour from the time this wave reached its height over 90 per cent. of the houses in Sabine Pass were either lifted off their foundation, thrown down, drifted away, or destroyed. One hundred and thirty lives were lost, and the few people spared were left destitute.

[Here the hammer fell].

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendments being withdrawn, the Clerk will continue the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving ship-channel in Galveston Bay, Texas, from Morgan's Cut to Bolivar Channel: Continuing improvement, $100,000.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Chairman, this appropriation of $100,000 is for a ship-canal in Galveston Harbor and from Galveston Bay to Buffalo Bayou. I find that there have been appropriated up to July 1, 1887, $446,500 upon that operation, and that the estimate of the total expense as proposed in 1887 is $813,503. That is a large amount of money to appropriate for a canal in a harbor, and I have been interested in looking into the report to see what the work is.

Mr. KERR. I make the point of order that there is no amendment pending before the House on which debate can take place.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I move to strike out the last word. I find, Mr. Chairman, this project was discountenanced by the engineers. An examination was made in 1882 of the cut through the lower bay by Major Mansfield, the officer in charge, and he believed the results were not such as would induce him to go on with the work. It was accordingly suspended on the contract then in force in 1883, and the facts were reported to Congress. In the next river and harbor act, notwithstanding the report of the engineer, an appropriation was made for carrying on this work, with the proviso that no part of the money should be used until the Buffalo Bayou Ship Canal Company should relinquish or abandon to the United States all their franchise and right of collecting toll. But in the river and harbor act of August 5, 1886, the appropriation was continued, except that the final condition was omitted, so the work could proceed without requiring of the Buffalo Bayou Ship Canal Company any change in the terms of their agreement of 1881.

I will read from the Engineer's Report, in which they go on to describe the character of this work:

The survey developed the fact that the 12-foot contour in Bolivar Channel has receded southward about 2,400 feet. To complete the work it will be necessary to extend the excavation that far beyond its original terminus.

It appears, therefore, that out of the total length of channel excavated—18½ miles—9.43 miles have been obliterated, 2.11 miles have been fully maintained, and the remaining 6.81 miles have deteriorated 75 per cent., and the length of the channel must be increased 2,400 feet.

The rate of deterioration has not been uniform. An examination of the cut between Bolivar Channel and Redfish Bar was made in October, 1882, by which it was ascertained that about three-quarters of the work had been undone at that time, which was only two and one-third years after its completion. (See Annual Report of the Chief of Engineers for 1883, pages 1079, 1080.)

* * * * * * *

The deterioration between Redfish and Morgan's Cut has been less rapid than in the lower bay. It amounts to about 75 per cent. in four years, or 19 per cent. per year, if the rate of deterioration were uniform. But as the rate must have been greater the first year than in subsequent years, it is moderate to estimate that the maintenance of a channel 12 feet deep would require the removal each year of not less than 25 per cent. of the amount originally excavated.

Here are the facts, which leave but little scope for theory or opinion as to the amount of work which will be required to maintain the channel, or as to the necessity, when once the excavation is begun, of pushing it through to completion rapidly and then making the work of maintenance continuous.

It sometimes happens that a temporary deepening of a channel will be of value to vessels using it, even if it subsequently return to its original condition, because it enables them to load to a deeper draught for a longer or shorter period. Such is not the case here. The design is to create a commerce which does not now exist; that is, to provide a channel for sea-going vessels of deep draught, such as do not now visit Houston or cross the bay at all. The natural depth is sufficient for all vessels which now navigate the bay, loaded to their fullest capacities.

Mr. Chairman, I content myself with calling the attention of the House to these statements from the official reports bearing upon these expenditures. I do not propose to resort to any obstructive tactics or dilatory motions to prevent the House from voting such appropriations in these cases as the majority may be willing to approve, and the large preponderance of the votes in favor of the appropriations embraced in this bill shows plainly the intention of the House. I think it proper, however, that the facts which I have cited should be stated to the House and go upon the record.

Mr. KERR. Mr. Chairman, the report of the engineers in this case does not, in my judgment, justify any appropriation whatever. But before proceeding further, I move to strike out the entire appropriation of $100,000 for this ship-canal in Galveston Bay. The engineers in charge say of it that it is an attempt to make a seaport of Buffalo Bayou at or near Houston, some 60 miles from the Gulf of Mexico. They say further in the same report:

An examination made in October, 1882, of the cut through the lower bay led Major Mansfield, the officer in charge, to believe that the results were not such as to justify going on with the work. It was accordingly suspended at the termination of the contract then in force, in June, 1883, and the facts were reported to Congress. The unexpended balance then remaining available was $159,870.50.

I wish to call attention specially to the following statement, taken from his report:

It sometimes happens that a temporary deepening of a channel will be of value to vessels using it, even if it subsequently return to its original condition, because it enables them to load to a deeper draught for a longer or shorter period. Such is not the case here. The design is to create a commerce which does not now exist; that is, to provide a channel for sea-going vessels of deep draught, such as do not now visit Houston or cross the bay at all. The natural depth is sufficient for all vessels which now navigate the bay, loaded to their fullest capacities. No useful result can be obtained from expenditures upon this work until it is completed and such provision made for its maintenance as will inspire confidence in its permanency as a highway of commerce. Important trade will not follow an uncertain highway. To half finish it, or one-quarter finish it one year, and then leave it to be continued at some indefinite time in the future is a waste of money. There should be on hand when the work is begun funds sufficient to carry it through and maintain it at least one year.

The report goes on further to state:

Believing it to be useless to begin the work with the funds available, I recommended in my report of May 30 that their expenditure should be deferred until they should be largely increased by further appropriations. This recommendation was disapproved "by reason of the mandatory terms of the act of August 5, 1886, directing its expenditure," and I was ordered to begin work with as little delay as practicable.

Further on in the same report I find the following:

The estimate, $317,000, submitted for continuing the work during the year ending June 30, 1889, is the amount required to complete the original excavation and to maintain it one year. With this sum, and with regular appropriations thereafter, the work can be carried to a successful completion. With a sum much less than this, or with irregular appropriations thereafter, the work is, in my judgment, entirely impracticable.

The report goes on to say that if it were finished it will require $100,000 a year of the people's money to maintain that channel.

We are asked here in this bill to make an appropriation which the engineer in charge of this work has reported to be entirely useless, or, in other words, to appropriate $100,000 for nothing. After all the appropriations which have been made upon this work, and which the engineers show has been destroyed, we are told by the engineers that it will require $100,000 a year, even when finished, afterwards through all time to keep it so that it will be of any value. And that is the kind of appropriations recommended by this Committee on Rivers and Harbors, including with the other appropriations in the bill nearly $1,000,000 for the harbor of Galveston alone—one-twentieth of the entire appropriation to a single district in Texas, and a large part for a work that the engineer in charge says is under the circumstances entirely impracticable.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. STEWART, of Texas. Mr. Chairman, perhaps it will be necessary for me to give an explanation of this work. It was originally commenced by private enterprise, under a charter granted to the company by the State of Texas. After that company had accumulated considerable work and expended quite a large sum of money upon it, it made a proposition to the Government of the United States, which I will read. It is in the following words:

Resolved, That when the Government of the United States shall have completed a ship-channel—

And here in parenthesis I may say it is not a "canal," but a "channel"— for vessels of 12 feet draught, from Bolivar Channel to the channel constructed by this company, it will turn over and surrender to the United States Government the said work at cost, or at the valuation that may be placed upon it by a commission of United States engineers designated by the Government of the United States to determine the value of the same.

Under this proposition Congress passed the following act:

In consideration of the propositions of the Buffalo Bayou Ship Channel Company to turn over their work at Morgan's Point, and to surrender their charter granted by the Legislature of Texas, which proposition is now on file in the War Department, and is hereby accepted—

I call attention to the language of the act, "which is hereby accepted"— the Government hereby adopts the line surveyed from the cut in Red Fish Bar to the cut in Morgan's Point, and the sum of $80,000 is hereby appropriated for the improvement of that line: Provided, That no part of said sum shall be expended until said Buffalo Bayou Ship Channel Company shall file with the Secretary of War, in manner and form to be by him approved, the acceptance of these provisions of this act.

The ship-channel company filed a release in the War Department, which was accepted by the Government as a full compliance with the act, and which is now on file.

Now I contend, Mr. Chairman, that good faith upon the part of this Government, having accepted all the propositions made by the ship-channel company, having required them to file a release, with which provision they have complied, and having appropriated a part of the money for the construction of the work, good faith on the part of the Government requires that they should go on and complete the work. As a matter of course, invested with sovereignty as it is, the Government may repudiate its contracts, but I do not believe that any member of this House, knowing the contract has been made by this Government, will vote to repudiate the same.

In addition to the question of good faith upon the part of the Government involved in this matter, I say there is also a great and commercial necessity for the completion of that work, as much so as for any work almost in progress. The city of Houston is situated upon Buffalo Bayou, which bayou empties into the San Jacinto River, and the San Jacinto River empties into Galveston Bay. At Galveston Bay we have at this point an average depth of but 9 feet of water. What we want is this channel of 12 feet in depth and 100 feet in width, which the Government undertook and is under a moral obligation to complete to give us an outlet to the sea. The importance of the work will be manifest from an examination of the commerce there, and its speedy completion is imperative.

Mr. Chairman, Houston is a great railroad center. There are a number of railroads centering there which transport to that point for shipment vast amounts of the products of the country.

Mr. LANHAM was recognized and yielded his time to Mr. STEWART, of Texas.

Mr. STEWART, of Texas. We have the Southern Pacific Railway with a mileage of 2,596 miles; the Texas and New Orleans division, 603 miles; the Houston and Texas Central Railway, 747 miles; the International and Great Northern Railway, 332 miles; the Gulf, Colorado and Sante Fé Railway, a mileage of 359 miles; the Galveston, Houston and Henderson Railway, 50 miles; the Houston and Columbia Railway, 50 miles. There is also the Texas Western Railway, the Texas Transportation Company on Buffalo Bayou, and the Houston, East and West Texas Railway Company; and without going further it is only necessary to say that eleven roads center at this one point, with a total mileage of 5,535 miles, and this channel is the only outlet for this great railroad center to the Gulf. Two other roads are now in progress of construction and partly built, both heading for the city of Houston.

The traffic upon the bayou is large. I will not consume time by giving all the statistics which I hold in my hand, but I will call the attention of the committee to one or two of the leading articles of commerce there. I read from a report from the Cotton Exchange and Board of Trade for the city of Houston, which shows that in the year 1887 they received 748,036 bales of cotton in that town. More than a half million, aye, nearly three-quarters of a million bales of cotton were received there in that one year, and that vast traffic is completely at the mercy of the railroads. The only thing to regulate the freight there, in order to enable our people to get their cotton to the sea, is the completion of this channel. But for a long time after the commencement of the channel work was suspended for want of appropriations, and necessarily there was a deterioration in the work consequent upon this lapse of time.

These things being so—and I could advert to other statistics, but I am reminded that I am consuming time, though I must be pardoned in this case, for this is my own town, my own city—these things being so, and this being our only outlet to the sea, we want it completed. We want it completed, Mr. Chairman, I care not what it costs. If it costs a hundred thousand dollars a year it is a sum worthily expended, because of the vast commerce that will go through it. But I do not believe it will cost such a sum. The engineer the gentleman quotes had only recently been appointed to duty there, and he has made a supplemental report in which he says that the cost will not be within a hundred thousand dollars of the amount he first estimated, while the cost of maintenance will not exceed $70,000. I do not believe it will take $50,000. I believe $25,000 will do it and maintain the channel properly; and when it is done it is of vast benefit to us, to our State, and all the people of Texas; and not only will it be of local advantage to Texas, but is a matter of internal commerce benefiting the entire nation.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I believe in the judicious and liberal appropriation of money for the improvement of the rivers and harbors of the Republic, and so believing I would refuse appropriation of money that will not accomplish the end in view. I know nothing of the item under consideration, except from the report of the engineer officer in charge, page 1420, from which it appears there has already been a very large amount expended on this work, three-fourths of which has been lost by filling up. That it will take $317,000 to complete the work and maintain it one year, and $99,000 annually to maintain it after completion. The engineer says to half finish the work in one year, then leave it to be continued in the future, is a waste of money. There should be on hand when the work is begun funds sufficient to carry it through and maintain it at least one year. This takes over $300,000. The bill only carries $100,000. The $100,000, if given, will be wasted. If anything is given the whole amount should be given. I believe the work could be abandoned without injury to any interest of sufficient importance to warrant appropriation. I will vote for the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KERR] to strike it out.

Mr. KERR. I made the motion to strike out the entire appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KERR] to strike out the appropriation.

The question being taken, the Chairman stated that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. KERR. I call for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 30, noes 71.

Mr. KERR. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN appointed as tellers Mr. KERR and Mr. BLANCHARD.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 24, noes 123.

Mr. KERR. I do not desire to take up uselessly the time of the committee, and as the result is inevitable, I withdraw the point of no quorum.

So (further count not being called for) the motion to strike out the paragraph was not agreed to.

Mr. CRAIN. I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the desk, and I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD the remarks I desire to offer in connection with the amendment.

The Clerk read the proposed amendment, as follows:

In line 243 strike out "$500,000" and insert "$1,000,000;" so that it will read: "Improvement of entrance to Galveston Harbor, Texas: Continuing improvement, $1,000,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to print some remarks on this amendment.

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I ask unanimous consent that every gentleman who desires to print remarks on this bill may be allowed to do so.

Mr. HEARD. I object.

The question being put on the amendment of Mr. CRAIN, it was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

Improving harbor at Cleveland, Ohio: Continuing improvement on the last plan projected, $75,000.

Mr. FORAN. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 255 strike out "$75,000" and insert "$150,000."

Mr. FORAN. If I can obtain the attention of the committee for a moment, I think I can make it very evident that this amendment should prevail. I do not rise for the purpose of hearing myself talk, or for the satisfaction of seeing my name in the RECORD. I am exceedingly glad we have escaped from the sand-laden, teredo, and tornado-cursed waters of the Gulf of Mexico and are now on the placid and crystalline waters of Lake Erie. The committee gave Cleveland the usual percentage of what the local engineer estimated. One hundred and fifty thousand dollars was the estimate of the engineer. Since that estimate, however, the plan of the breakwater in Cleveland has been changed so as to increase its cost $300,000. The engineer estimated that to complete the breakwater upon the old plan would cost $319,000, and that upon the basis of the new plan the cost will be $620,000.

So it is fair to presume if the engineer in making his estimate knew the work was to be completed on the last projected plan he would have made his estimate at least $300,000. I desire to say $75,000 is of no possible benefit to the breakwater at Cleveland. We might as well have no appropriation at all. One hundred and fifty thousand dollars can be very profitably expended upon that breakwater during the next fiscal year, and such an appropriation will complete so much of the work that it will be possible to utilize it this fall as a harbor of refuge.

A great deal was said about the commerce of Galveston, which it was stated amounted to $73,000,000. The commerce of the harbor of Cleveland, Ohio, amounts to $77,000,000. It has been said here that five or six hundred vessels entered Galveston during 1887. The entrances and clearances at Cleveland were over eight thousand vessels. The exports from Cleveland last year were $46,140,000, and the imports were over $30,000,000, including merchandise of all kinds and descriptions—coal, oil, and merchandise of a general character.

This breakwater at Cleveland has been in course of construction for thirteen years. There has never been less than $100,000 for it in any appropriation bill, except in the bill of last session, which failed. There was in that bill a small appropriation, because there was on hand at that time $165,000 unexpended.

But that money has been all expended and the engineer, if called upon to make his estimate now, seeing the plan has been changed, would undoubtedly estimate $300,000. Less than $150,000 will be useless. It would hardly pay to begin work with the amount this bill appropriates for that harbor.

Mr. Chairman, I have in my hand resolutions adopted by the Board of Industry and Improvement at Cleveland, which I ask to have read by the Clerk as bearing upon this subject. I really think that the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and the members of that committee, when they understand the matter properly, will not object to my amendment.

The Clerk read the resolutions, as follows:

Whereas we are informed that $75,000 only has been recommended for appropriation by Congress towards building the Cleveland breakwater; and

Whereas we learn from competent authority that fully 2,000 feet of breakwater can be constructed during the season of 1888, costing not less than $150,000, provided such sum is appropriated for that purpose, so that early contracts can be made, thereby insuring an extended area of protected space for refuge purposes available in time this year for the severe storms that usually prevail every fall, thus probably saving valuable lives and property engaged in the Lake commerce; and

Whereas the great importance of securing continuous work and thereby early final completion of such a necessary water-way improvement can not be overrated: Therefore,

Resolved, That the members of Congress are hereby most respectfully but urgently requested to give due consideration to the interests of the great interlake commerce and permit such an appropriation, say not less than $150,000, for the Cleveland breakwater, so as to insure the completion of as much work as can be done during this year.

Resolved, That the secretary be requested to forward to Senators PAYNE and SHERMAN and to Representatives FORAN and GROSVENOR copies of this action of the board, with request that every effort be made to secure a commensurate appropriation.

Mr. FORAN. Mr. Chairman, in addition to what I have already said, I desire to say that although over $900,000 has been expended upon this breakwater it is to-day practically useless for the commerce of the lake because of its incomplete condition, but the merchants and vessel owners of Cleveland say that with the construction of 2,000 feet more the breakwater will be available to protect vessels in the fall and spring, the seasons when storms prevail. An appropriation of $75,000, as I have said, is of no possible benefit for this work. I hardly think it would be worth while to advertise for bids upon such an appropriation. Cleveland is one of the most important cities upon the lakes. It is a city of nearly 300,000 inhabitants, a city whose commerce is over seventy-seven millions annually. I am in earnest in this matter, and I trust that the committee will agree to the amendment I have offered, because it is really needed to make this breakwater of any service.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Chairman, the committee gave Cleveland 50 per cent. of the estimate submitted to them. This work fared better than the majority of the projects in the bill. In the bill of 1886 there was appropriated for the harbor of Cleveland $93,000 upon a very much larger estimate than the one submitted at this time. Now, while there was appropriated in 1886 $93,000, I find that on the 1st of November, 1888, only a few months ago, there was still on hand $91,000 of that amount. If we had provided for Cleveland and for the other places in this bill on the scale which my friend [Mr. FORAN] asks, we would have brought in a bill appropriating from forty-five to fifty millions of dollars. There are many other points in the United States just as meritorious as Cleveland and just as much entitled to be allowed the full amount of the estimates, but in all such cases we have reduced the amounts as we have done in this case. I repeat that if we give Cleveland what the gentleman asks for in this amendment there are forty other places in the country where we ought to do the same thing.

Mr. FORAN. Do I understand the gentleman to say that there is on hand now $91,000?

Mr. BLANCHARD. No, sir. I said that on the 1st of November, 1887, there was still in the Treasury, to the credit of this fund, $91,000. I will go farther now, and say to the gentleman that nearly all of it was covered by existing contracts, but, nevertheless, the money was still on hand unexpended. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the committee I shall stand by the report, but it is due to the interests represented by my colleague from Cleveland [Mr. FORAN] to say that the report of the engineers under which he asks for this appropriation was made at a period much later than the one on which the appropriation reported by the committee is based. Therefore, while it is true, as stated by the chairman of the committee, that the amount asked for in the estimate was $150,000, and that we gave 50 per cent. of that estimate, $75,000, it is equally true that the language of the supplemental report of the local engineer, which is approved by the Chief of Engineers, indicates a demand for a very much larger sum, the implication being that the amount which he desires to expend is $300,000. Of course it is not necessary for me to concede what is claimed by my colleague [Mr. FORAN], as to the importance of the harbor at Cleveland, nor is it important at this point in the discussion for me to reiterate what has been said by the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. I only felt that it was due to myself, inasmuch as I had been appealed to so strongly by the commercial bodies of Cleveland, to point out how much at variance the two estimates are and to call attention to the fact of this supplemental report having been made.

Mr. KERR. Mr. Chairman, I desire to emphasize the remark made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], who has just taken his seat, in regard to this report. The gentleman says that as a member of the committee he will stand by the report. He is a Republican member of that committee, and yet here is the great harbor of Cleveland——

Mr. GROSVENOR. I want to correct my friend right there.

Mr. KERR. Are you not a Republican?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am a Republican, but not a Republican member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Mr. KERR. Then I understand that committee is organized so as to be entirely neutral; that it has no politics except such as will secure the best distribution of the money in the national Treasury in the interests of the men who compose the committee, and I rose simply for the purpose of emphasizing that fact. [Laughter.]

Mr. FORAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD] made the statement that there was $93,000 appropriated by the Forty-ninth Congress for the improvement of the harbor at Cleveland. Now, the gentleman well knew that that statement was misleading. The amount given by this House for that work was over $120,000, but it was scaled down in the Senate.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I have the book before me, and the act of 1886.

Mr. FORAN. Does not the gentleman understand that the Senate scaled down the river and harbor bill that year?

Mr. BLANCHARD. As the bill became a law there was $93,000 appropriated for this work.

Mr. FORAN. As it became a law—I am not talking about that.

Mr. BLANCHARD. That is all I stated.

Mr. FORAN. But the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of this House gave for the improvement of the harbor of Cleveland over $120,000 that year.

Now, Mr. Chairman, without going over these other items in the bill, I wish to say again, as to the harbor of Galveston and all these other harbors that have been discussed so largely, that not one of them is as important as the harbor of Cleveland, yet here is an appropriation of only $75,000 proposed for a work which will require $600,000 to complete. It is preposterous. I would rather have the item struck out entirely. As I said before, it would be idle to advertise for bids upon such an appropriation.

Mr. FARQUHAR. It is evident that a supplemental report has come in for Cleveland, which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] agrees that it is right and proper we should consider before the bill is passed. At the same time he qualifies that by saying that he will stand by the report of the committee.

Now, my question is this: Is the rule of the River and Harbor Committee, or their line of courtesy, so inflexible that no man who offers on this floor an amendment in behalf of his own harbor or river can carry the amendment, although it is backed up by an engineer's report? I think it ought to be pretty well understood, and it is among old members, that annually this bill passes without our being able to amend it in any particular.

Here is a deserving harbor; here is a report which certainly sustains all that the gentleman from the Cleveland district [Mr. FORAN] has stated; yet in the face of this we have to have, first of all, the condescension of a committee in order to come to a vote sensibly on a proposition of this kind. I undertake to say this is a handicapping of a worthy object. I hope the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors will state whether it is not proper and just in reference to the harbor of Cleveland that this appropriation of $150,000 advocated by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FORAN] should go into the bill. All that the gentleman has said about Cleveland every member from the North and Northwest well knows to be true. There is no more deserving harbor. We all know that this work is in course of construction. This harbor is on the south shore of Lake Erie, and, until you reach Buffalo, there is not another harbor of refuge that any storm-ridden craft can go into. While we are voting money by hundreds of thousands to make harbors, here is one that ought to be fortified by its proper sea-wall.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. FORAN, there were—ayes 62, noes 56.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Let us have tellers.

Mr. FORAN. Then you will have tellers on every vote hereafter.

The CHAIRMAN. No quorum having voted, the Chair will appoint as tellers the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FORAN] and the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD].

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 65, noes 76.

Mr. FORAN. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. No quorum having appeared, the Clerk, in pursuance of the rule, will call the roll.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I ask unanimous consent that the committee rise.

There being no objection, the committee rose.

The Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ROGERS reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9050) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

HANNAH C. DE WITT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a veto message from the President of the United States; which was read, as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval House bill No. 823, entitled "An act granting a pension to Hannah C. De Witt." An act, the precise duplicate of this, was passed at the present session of the Congress, and received executive approval on the 10th day of March, 1888. Pursuant to said act, the name of the beneficiary mentioned in the bill herewith returned has been placed upon the pension-roll. The second enactment is of course entirely useless, and was evidently passed by mistake.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, April 21, 1888.

[Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. What action will the House take on this message? [A pause.] If there be no objection, the message, with the accompanying bill, will be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

WILLIAM H. BROKENSHAW.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following veto message of the President of the United States; which was read, and, on motion of Mr. HOLMAN, referred, with the accompanying bill, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval House bill No. 418, entitled "An act granting a pension to William H. Brokenshaw."

The history of the military service of the beneficiary mentioned in this bill, as derived from the records of the War Department, shows that he was received at draft rendezvous at Jackson, Mich., on the 25th day of March, 1865; that he was sent to the Twenty-Fourth Regiment of Michigan Volunteers on the 29th day of the same month, and that he was present with his command without any record of disability from that date until the 30th day of June, 1865, when he was mustered out with his company. It will thus be seen that he was in the service a few days more than three months, just at the close of the war. It is not alleged that he did any actual fighting.

In 1883 he filed an application for pension, alleging that on the evening of the 25th of March, 1865, being the day he was received at rendezvous, he was injured in his ribs while getting into his bunk, by three other recruits who were scuffling in the room and who jumped upon him or crushed him against the side of his bunk.

An examination made upon such application made in 1884 tended to show an injury to his ribs, but the claim was rejected upon the ground that no injury was incurred in the line of duty. It must be conceded that upon the claimant's own showing he was not injured as an incident to military service.

Aside from this objection, it is hardly possible that an injury of this kind, producing the consequences which it is alleged followed its infliction, could have been sustained by this soldier and not in the least interrupted the performance of his military service, though such service was very short, and, probably, not severe. When with this it is considered that eighteen years elapsed between the date of the alleged injury and the soldier's application for pension I am satisfied that no injustice will be done if the disposition made of this case by the Pension Bureau is allowed to stand.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, April 21, 1888.

MORRIS T. MANTON.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following veto message of the President of the United States; which was read, and, on motion of Mr. HOLMAN, referred, with the accompanying bill, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval House bill No. 4633, entitled "An act granting a pension to Morris T. Mantor."

The records in this case show that the beneficiary named in this bill enlisted on the 25th day of February, 1864, and that he was mustered out July 18, 1865. It is also shown that though he was reported sick a considerable part of his period of service, there is no mention of any trouble with his eyes.

In the year 1880, he filed an application for pension, alleging dropsy and disease of his eyes, caused by an explosion of ammunition. The case was examined in 1882 and 1883, and was again specially examined very thoroughly and critically in 1885. The evidence thus secured seemed to establish the fact that the claimant's eyes were sore for many years before enlistment, and that their condition before that date, during his service, and after his discharge did not materially differ. It also appeared that no pensionable disability from dropsy had existed since the filing of his application.

On these grounds the application was rejected, and I am convinced such action was entirely justified. The reported conduct of the claimant on the last examination, and his attempts to influence witnesses in their testimony, add weight to the proposition quite well established by the proof, that his claim to a pension lacks merit.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, April 21, 1888.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

Mr. DANIEL introduced a bill (S. 2774) authorizing the Richmond and Danville Railroad Company to lay tracks, etc., in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. BATE introduced a bill (S. 2775) for the relief of J. Kropp, administrator of Christian Kropp, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. STANFORD introduced a bill (S. 2776) to authorize the payment to Rear-Admiral John H. Russell of the highest pay of his grade; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. EVARTS introduced a bill (S. 2777) to amend the act of Congress approved March 3, 1875, entitled "An act to determine the jurisdiction of circuit courts of the United States and to regulate the removal of causes from State courts, and for other purposes," and to further regulate the jurisdiction of circuit courts of the United States, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MITCHELL introduced a bill (S. 2778) making an appropriation for the purchase of a site and the construction of a light-house on the headlands near the mouth of the Umpqua River, in the State of Oregon; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. EVARTS introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 75) authorizing and directing the Secretary of State to contract for the purchase of copies of the publication entitled "The Manufactures of the United States for Domestic and Foreign Trade," for use in the United States consular service; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

AMENDMENT TO A BILL.

Mr. STEWART submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

POSTMASTERS' CLAIMS.

Mr. GEORGE submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be requested to transmit to the Senate a tabulated statement of the disallowed postmasters' claims presented from the State of Mississippi under the act of March 3, 1883, exhibiting all such claims, as by an actual computation of commissions prescribed by the act of 1854, and entered upon claim-jackets, show that the paid salaries are 10 per cent. or more less than such commissions, such tabulated statement to show in each case, first, the name of the post-office; second, the name of the applicant; third, the period of service covered by the computation of commissions; fourth, the amount of the computed commissions; fifth, the amount of paid salary for the same term of service; sixth, the actual amount of commissions in excess of the paid salary.

Mr. GEORGE. I ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. HARRIS. I wish to accompany the resolution with a motion to amend by inserting, after the word "Mississippi," the words "and Tennessee." Let that motion accompany the resolution to the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment moved by the Senator from Tennessee will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend the resolution by changing the word "State" to "States," and at the end of line 3, after the word "Mississippi," inserting "and Tennessee."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution, with the proposed amendment, will be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

PRESIDENTIAL POST-OFFICES.

Mr. SPOONER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to the Senate, at the earliest practicable date, a list of the Presidential post-offices in the United States and in the Territories whose annual receipts for the three last preceding years have exceeded $3,000 per annum, and also a statement of the amount of rent paid by the Government for the accommodation of each such post-office.

PATENT-OFFICE APPOINTMENTS.

Mr. HALE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Commissioners of the Civil Service be, and they hereby are, directed to send to the Senate, as soon as may be, a list of all persons certified for appointment to the Patent Office from March 4, 1885, to March 4, 1888; also a list of all persons selected and appointed under such certifications, with the class or grade of each.

CONSIDERATION OF PENSION BILLS.

Mr. DAVIS. I desire to give notice that on Thursday next, at the close of the routine morning business, I shall move the consideration of the unobjected pension cases on the Calendar.

COLUMBIA, TENN., ARSENAL.

Mr. HARRIS. If there be no further morning business, I ask the Senate to proceed at this time to the consideration of House bill 4365.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further resolutions, concurrent or other, the order of morning business is closed.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 4365.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Calendar under Rule VIII being in order, the Senator from Tennessee moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4365) to authorize the construction of an arsenal for the repair, storage, and distribution of ordnance and ordnance stores for the use of the Government of the United States, at Columbia, Tenn.

Mr. PLUMB. Yesterday the bill which I had in charge, Senate bill 1430, was under consideration with the understanding that its consideration should be resumed this morning. I have no objection to yielding reasonably to the Senator from Tennessee in the event that his bill will not take too much time. That is, I will not antagonize it, I mean.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not think it will take ten minutes to dispose of the bill. I was not aware, however, of the understanding the Senator from Kansas refers to.

Mr. PLUMB. I give notice that as soon as this bill is through I shall call up the land forfeiture bill.

Mr. HARRIS. If my bill should lead to any extended discussion, I shall not insist upon occupying the time of the Senate with it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question in on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Tennessee to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 4365) to authorize the construction of an arsenal for the repair, storage, and distribution of ordnance and ordnance stores for the use of the Government of the United States, at Columbia, Tenn. It proposes to appropriate $200,000 for the purpose of establishing an arsenal at Columbia, Tenn., for the repair, storage, and distribution of ordnance and ordnance stores.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FORFEITURE OF UNEARNED RAILROAD LANDS.

Mr. PLUMB. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 1430) to forfeit certain lands heretofore granted for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes.

Mr. CHACE. I ask the Senator from Kansas to give way that I may ask unanimous consent to take up Senate bill 554, and proceed with its consideration.

Mr. PLUMB. This bill has been under consideration in the Senate for a number of days. I ought to have pressed its consideration a long time before I did, but on account of the wish of certain Senators to unite in the perfection of an amendment to it which they regarded as material I allowed it to go over from time to time. I do not feel as though I could properly discharge my duty, unless the convenience of some Senator who is interested in the bill is concerned, if I allow it to go over any further. Its importance is certainly equal, if not superior, to that of the bill to which the Senator from Rhode Island refers.

Yesterday I gave the assurance that the vote should not be taken because of the desire of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] to be heard upon it, but with the fair understanding, as I thought then, that this morning the bill should be proceeded with. Unless those Senators say they are not ready to go ahead, or unless in some way it concerns the convenience of some other Senator in reference to the subject-matter of the bill, I feel as though I ought to insist on the Senate proceeding with its consideration.

Mr. HOAR. I do not see the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] in his seat now. I should be very desirous to have him present when the matter comes up, as he is acquainted with it. I am myself prepared to say what I desire to say to the Senate about the bill, but at the same time I should like very much to accommodate the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE], whose bill is half way through. It would give me very great pleasure to have the land-forfeiture bill go over until to-morrow, but it would be on the ground of accommodating the Senator from Rhode Island. I have no personal wish in the matter.

Mr. CHACE. I have an assurance from the Senator from New Jersey that it would be more than agreeable to him to have the land bill go over.

Mr. MCPHERSON entered the Chamber.

Mr. COCKRELL. Here is the Senator from New Jersey now.

Mr. CHACE. He can answer for himself.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I have no objection to any arrangement of that kind.

Mr. PLUMB. That is not the point. Of course I am glad to know the Senator has no objection, but this is a bill of great importance, and its consideration ought to be proceeded with. The Senator from New Jersey said with some emphasis last week in a letter which he wrote to a brother Senator, and he said also yesterday, that he was desirous of being heard in regard to an amendment which he proposed to offer and which he regarded as material. I was willing the bill should go over until to-day for the purpose of giving the Senator ample time to consider what he would desire to offer. If he is prepared to say now that he does not desire to go ahead to-day, I shall ask the Senate to agree to consider the bill to-morrow.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I am free to say, if the Senator will allow me a moment, that I should prefer to be heard on the bill to-morrow, if that is satisfactory to the Senator.

Mr. PLUMB. I do not desire to press the consideration of the bill against the convenience of Senators, and if I can have unanimous consent that to-morrow, immediately at the close of the morning business, the bill shall come up as unfinished business, I am willing that it shall go over, with the understanding that I shall not then, unless compelled by a vote of the Senate, yield any further for the convenience of any one, but that the bill shall proceed to a conclusion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent that Senate bill 1430 may be taken up to-morrow morning at the conclusion of the formal morning business.

Mr. BECK. The object, I understand, now is to take up the copyright bill, is it not?

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator from Rhode Island has that in view.

Mr. BECK. The only reason why I rose is that I never looked into the copyright matter until last night, when I read over the evidence and found references to several reports made in regard to it. I think such a measure has been rejected twice by the Senate. Unless there is some pressing urgency to bring up the copyright bill to-day, I should like to get a chance to look up these matters.

Mr. PLUMB. What I said about the land-forfeiture bill is entirely apart from the copyright bill.

Mr. BECK. I thought if that should go over the copyright bill perhaps would come up.

Mr. PLUMB. It is a question as to what the Senate will do if the land bill goes over.

Mr. HOAR. I understand that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE] is prepared to take the floor on the copyright bill.

Mr. BECK. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Will the Senate agree that the bill (S. 1430) to forfeit certain lands heretofore granted for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes, shall be taken up to-morrow morning at the conclusion of the formal morning business? Is there objection? The Chair hears none. It is so ordered.

INTERNATIONAL COPYRIGHT.

Mr. CHACE. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 554.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Calendar under Rule VIII being in order, the Senator from Rhode Island moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 554) to amend Title LX, chapter 3, of the Revised Statutes.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to section 2 the following proviso:

Provided, That publishers of newspapers or other periodicals in the United States shall be allowed to copy in those publications any articles which may appear in the newspapers or other periodicals of any foreign country, and for that purpose, but not for sale, shall be allowed to import such newspapers and other periodicals.

Mr. CHACE. Mr. President, there is not much more that need be said in regard to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont; but I believe I can bring to the knowledge of Senators a few matters which, if any of them are disposed to support that amendment, may influence their judgment.

In the first place, in regard to newspapers, I hold in my hand a supplement of the New York Times of November 17, 1887, and that paper contains a whole book, from beginning to end, the entire copy of Swinburne's Locrine. If the amendment of the Senator from Vermont should prevail, the author of that book would be not only prevented from securing a copyright abroad, but in effect his domestic copyright would be entirely destroyed and have no value whatever. It seems to me that this one instance is a sufficient illustration of the injurious and wrongful effects of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont, if it should prevail.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to ask the Senator from Rhode Island a question if he will allow me to do so.

Mr. CHACE. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. Would the effect of this bill be to destroy such publications as the Leonard-Scott Company republications of the English reviews?

Mr. CHACE. Not at all. If any publisher or republisher of any review wished to go on with his business he would simply have to do what he now ought to do, pay for what he gets. I will say in reply further to the Senator from Mississippi that I hold in my hand the most prominent magazine which is a reprint, and the retail price of it is 18 cents.

Mr. GEORGE. Such republications, as I understand the Senator, would be discontinued or prohibited by the bill——

Mr. CHACE. Not at all.

Mr. GEORGE. Unless the Leonard-Scott Company should succeed in buying the right to republish from the original parties?

Mr. CHACE. Undoubtedly. The sole and entire object of a copyright bill is to give the owner, the author, the man who produces the literary work, the control of his own production. It goes without saying that if we protect a man in the possession of his property no other man can take that property away from him without paying him for it.

Mr. GEORGE. Then I understand you answer my question in the affirmative.

Mr. CHACE. No, not at all in the affirmative, because it is the rule now that many publishers who reprint pay foreigner authors for their works. These men would undoubtedly do that. It is a simple question whether they shall pay for what they reprint, and in no sense a question of the suppression of the magazine.

The question has been bruited here about the cost of reading to the public. The impression seems to prevail that if this literature is—I will not use the word pirated, because it seems to be offensive, although that has come to be a technicality in the trade, I will say that if it is taken without paying for it—the impression seems to have gained ground and got possession of the minds of Senators and others that if the publisher takes the work of the foreign author without paying for it, then perforce the reading public is going to get that literature at a lower rate. We have a practical test of that question right here. I have procured copies of a number of the popular magazines which are published in this country, and also of the two prominent magazines which are reprints, so called.

Littell's Living Age, which is entirely devoted to reprinting and which I understand as a rule does not pay for its literature, which takes it from the foreign author without pay, and which according to the idea that prevails in the minds of Senators would be sold cheaper, is published four times a month. This copy [exhibiting] contains fifty-five pages of reading matter. That would be equal to two hundred and twenty pages a month. The price of that magazine is $8 a year.

Now let us see what some other popular magazines are. There is the Century Magazine of one hundred and fifty-six pages, and the price of that is $4 a year. That magazine pays for its matter. The author gets his pay. If the publication of Littell was sold to the reading public at the same price per page that the Century Magazine is sold for, it would be sold for $5.75 instead of $8.

Mr. VANCE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CHACE. With pleasure.

Mr. VANCE. Is not the matter on a page much greater in amount in Littell's magazine than it is in the Century?

Mr. CHACE. Oh, no.

Mr. VANCE. Is it not twice as much?

Mr. CHACE. No, no! That will not do. The fact is it is one of those cases that work like a good many other matters. Practically you find it is not what you supposed it was if you had not examined. Here is the other magazine, the Eclectic, as it is called. Senators can look at it. Here is the letter-press, almost identically the same, with this difference, that every one of these magazines that I hold in my hand, the Century, the Atlantic, the Lippincott, and Harper's, is better executed in paper and letter-press and type. Here they are [exhibiting], and Senators can look at them. Here is the Eclectic; and every one of them is better executed than it and Littell's Living Age. Here is one with one hundred and sixty-three pages—the Eclectic. That is a magazine that sells for $5 a year. Here is a magazine with one hundred and sixty pages in it. That is the magazine that pays for its literature, and that sells for $4 a year—a pretty practical illustration; and I should like to have Senators on the other side, if they have any doubts in their minds, come here and examine these magazines. It needs but a cursory glance to see that every word I have said about the size of the type, the amount of the matter, the quality of the paper, and all the work generally, is vastly superior in these other magazines to what it is in them.

It is said "comparisons are odious." I do not wish to make any. The Century Magazine sells for $4. It is just about the same size as Harper's, which also sells for $4.

Mr. VANCE. Then the Senator, as I understand him, contends that the copyright is wanted for the authors to enable them to furnish their works at a cheaper price.

Mr. CHACE. The Senator would please me very much indeed if he would use his felicitous manner of expression a little in my favor. What I propose is that the author shall receive the pay for what honestly belongs to him. I propose simply to do exactly even-handed justice to the author.

What I further say, and what I put against the theories of the Senator from North Carolina, and others like him, is that while he proposes to say that we shall get this literature cheaper if we take it without paying for it, the fact is, as appears by this practical illustration, that instead of getting it cheaper we pay more for it. Now, who gets that difference? The man who publishes the magazine who comes here and asks us to do an injustice to the author in order that he may continue his business, as he says, whereas, if this proposed law is put in force, it will not prevent him from continuing his business; the market is still open to him, and he can take these works and pay for them. As the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] suggests to me, he is just like everybody else, he pays for his matter. No, it will not do. Here is a demonstration patent before our eyes. These men take from the author without paying for it, and they take from the public more than the real value; and the difference goes into their pockets and not into the pockets of the public; but if it did go into the pockets of the public, it still would not make it any nearer right.

Now, I want to call attention to one or two more illustrations of this point. I hold in my hand Scribner's Magazine, which is also of a very high character of work. The execution is very fine, as the Senator from North Carolina can see. It is just about the same size as the Eclectic. That contains 126 pages and sells for 25 cents a number, or $3 a year.

Mr. VANCE. How many of the pages are devoted to advertisements?

Mr. CHACE. The Senator will excuse me. I am sorry he would impute to me such a matter as that. I do not make any such statements. I hope the Senator does not think I would attempt to impose on the Senate by palming off advertisements as reading matter. Mr. President, that is not my method. I am talking about the reading matter that is in these magazines. There is a magazine that pays for its material to the author, and is sold still cheaper—sold for $3 a year.

So I think, Mr. President, that these illustrations sufficiently dispose of the idea, and I have it further from gentlemen who are constantly procuring foreign matter to republish in this country that they pay for it. There is no difficulty in procuring it.

These, together with the illustration I have given of the newspaper with a whole book published in it, it seems to me ought to dispose of this amendment, and I ask the Senate to vote on the amendment now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL].

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, the Senator from Rhode Island has spoken of Littell's Living Age. Any Senator who will look at the type of Littell's Living Age will see that it is so much smaller than the type of Harper's Magazine or the Century that probably at least double the quantity of matter is printed on a single page that is printed on one of the pages of the Century or Harper's, but that does not determine the question at all.

Mr. CHACE. Will the Senator excuse me?

Mr. MORRILL. Certainly.

Mr. CHACE. I do not believe for a moment that the Senator from Vermont means to misstate things, but I am sure the Senator is mistaken. The two magazines are here, and if the Senator chooses to look at them and compare the size of the page, I think he will himself be readily convinced that he is greatly in error.

Mr. MORRILL. I think there is considerable of a difference.

But, Mr. President, the question is whether we shall admit these foreign magazines to come here and be copyrighted. It is not likely that many of them will come, but the expense would not be great for merely setting up the type and having a single copy or a few hundred or a few thousand printed here. There is no reason on the part of such American magazines as we have for going abroad and being copyrighted there, as no foreigners could afford to publish them with the illustrations, and therefore they are protected. It would be impossible in any reasonable time for any foreign publisher to get out an edition of Harper's, or of the Century Magazine, because it takes some considerable time to produce the plates.

Then the publications in the Eclectic Magazine and in Littell's Living Age are certainly of a select character. They contain the cream of all the foreign magazines; and the only way in which they can be obtained in this country is to allow them to be printed in that way. Otherwise they would not come here except at a very large cost, and very few people would ever have an opportunity to obtain any selection of the foreign magazines and standard periodicals.

I do not desire that the foreign publications shall come here and be reprinted as a whole, but there is a certain part and parcel of what appears in the periodical press abroad which is exceedingly valuable. I would not care to have Dickens's work here commenting on the United States, or Matthew Arnold's, or those of various other foreigners reprinted here, but there are some authors that it would be desirable we should obtain, and obtain at an early day. I trust, therefore, that the sense of the Senate will consider that we have done enough for copyrighting when we limit it to books, and that is the proposition which is made by my amendment.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Mr. President, I agree to some extent with the suggestion in the report made by the Senator reporting this bill, on the second page, where it is said:

> This is a simple question of our moral obligation as a nation to recognize the property rights of foreign authors.

In so far as this bill proposes to proceed on that line, I am heartily in favor of it. I do not believe that we have any more right to appropriate the intellectual labor of one man than we have to appropriate the manual labor of another; but it seems to me that there is a very large-sized fly in the ointment. On page 4 of the bill the following provision appears:

> During the existence of such copyright the importation into the United States of any book or other article so copyrighted shall be, and it hereby is, prohibited, except in the cases specified in section 2505 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and except in the case of persons purchasing for use and not for sale, who import not more than two copies at any one time, in each of which cases the written consent of the proprietor of the copyright, signed in the presence of two witnesses, shall be furnished with each importation. All officers of customs and postmasters are hereby required to seize and destroy all copies of such prohibited articles as shall be entered at the custom-house or otherwise brought into the United States, or transmitted to the mails of the United States. In the case of books in foreign languages, of which only translations in English are copyrighted, the prohibition of importation shall apply only to the translation of the same, and the importation of the books in the original language shall be permitted.

This proposition to absolutely prohibit the importation of books which happen to be copyrighted in the United States seems to me to be simply monstrous. If we were to provide a tariff tax of 100 per cent. on any copyrighted book imported into the United States, it might be complained that the tax was unreasonable, that it was extraordinarily high, that it was a practical prohibition; but for the first time, I believe, in any legislation not pertaining to something pernicious, or in itself absolutely objectionable, we propose to apply absolute, actual prohibition in the case of the introduction of books from abroad.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. Is not this proposition which he opposes the existing law everywhere? Is it not the existing law not only in this country, but in every country under heaven, that whatever works that country sees fit to copyright it prohibits the importation of from abroad. It is the case with our present domestic law; it is the case with the English law, and it is the case everywhere.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. If that is the case, and we propose now that the United States shall not be hereafter a Barbary Coast in literature and in commerce, I think it is time that we should take the example of the rest of the civilized world and that at least respectable foreign books should not be prohibited from circulation in our country.

So far as I am concerned, while I am perfectly willing to give to foreign authors the right to use their own publications here and to derive a benefit from their publications, I am not willing to say that any American citizen shall not have the right, if he chooses to do so, to buy foreign publications. You may put on any proper tariff tax that you see fit; but I am not willing to say that an American shall not have the right to import a foreign book if he chooses to do it. The proposition seems to me absolutely monstrous, and I for one will never consent to it; and if this provision remains in the bill, no matter whether I am in favor of copyright or not, I shall certainly vote against the bill.

Mr. CHACE. Before the Senator takes his seat, as he is a lawyer, I should like to ask him this question: If we grant a copyright to an author and permit foreigners to publish that book and bring it into this country, how are we going to enforce our law? It can not be done. It would be no copyright.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Enforce the law as you would any other law.

Mr. CHACE. But suppose that I take out a copyright for a book in this country and that any foreigner is permitted to bring that book to our country, our Government having no jurisdiction beyond its own territorial limits, if we permit the publication of that book abroad and the bringing of it in here does not that in effect absolutely nullify and destroy the whole force and effect of our legislation?

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I do not see how that can be possible, especially where we propose to become a member of the international copyright arrangement. Copyrights abroad protect authors, at least that has been my understanding, as stated by the authors of this bill all the time, while we of all the civilized nations of the world are the only one that is affording no sort of protection to our authors. When an author is protected in Great Britain, France, Germany, or elsewhere, and he issues a book under the copyright laws of one of those countries, I confess I can not see why, after he has been compensated by the publisher of his book at home, he may not be allowed to send the book into the United States and have it received here on paying a reasonable tariff duty, as one is paid on everything else imported. I do not see the slightest difficulty in the way.

Mr. HOAR. Shall I interrupt the Senator if I say a word?

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Not at all, sir.

Mr. HOAR. As I understand it, this bill, as it is drawn, allows to be done precisely what the Senator thinks ought to be done; that is, the author or proprietor abroad certifying his desire by the proper evidence, signing his name with two witnesses, can do that thing. He must determine whether he wants to do it or not, if he sells his copyright here. But if you have a provision that an English author may take a copyright here, and do not prohibit the importation of that book printed in England by other persons than the author, our copyright is absolutely worthless, and he is not protected against that by the fact that he has an English copyright. The English copyright law only punishes and only can punish, in the nature of things, publication in England. Now, suppose you have got an English copyright in Macaulay's History, and sell it to Mr. Morrison, here in Washington. He owns the copyright, and has an edition to supply the American people to their entire satisfaction. It is not quite just that some Englishman who does not pay anything to the author should strike off a surreptitious edition and send it over here and sell it without any prohibition. That is all this bill prohibits.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I was not aware before that the purpose of this bill was to protect the American people or to protect authors against pirating abroad. My impression was that the intention was to protect authors against pirating in the United States, and that the purpose of allowing a copyright here was to prevent an American publication of the work of a foreign author without proper compensation to him.

Mr. HOAR. Now, I would ask my honorable friend if he, on reflection (for he is a very candid man, as well as a wise one), thinks that it is just, as he says it is, that we should prevent the English author from having his work republished here without his consent by any American publisher, and at the same time allow that to be done by any English publisher. In other words, if we protect the man against the American pirate shall we permit the English pirate to come over here and establish himself on our soil and not protect the American publisher against him?

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. If our Government is not more neglectful in its duty in the way of protecting the foreign author than other nations are, there is no reason whatever for the passage of this bill. If foreigners are not protected here by proper copyright laws, there is no reason why they can come here and insist that we shall take care of them. I understand that the claim has been all along made that there is no civilized nation except the United States that is failing to do its duty towards authors in the matter of protecting them against the improper use of their productions by publishers. If that is the case, that is one question; but the case suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts is one of the failure on the part of Great Britain to protect properly an author in Great Britain and allow a book pirated in Great Britain to be brought into the United States for the purpose of being sold.

Mr. HOAR. My honorable friend, I think, misunderstands the point of my question, or I do not make it clear. Let me state it again. Suppose the Senator writes a book, a history of Arkansas, and he copyrights it in America, and then he sends it to England and copyrights it there, and makes an arrangement with an English publisher to print and circulate it, it being in good demand. Now would he think it was quite reasonable or fair that any other American should print that book here—not publish it but only print it here—secretly and palm it off and send it over to England and sell it there in such a way as not only to destroy the profit of his publisher but his own profit from his English copyright?

It is not a question of our having guarded against that. I assume that we have got the fullest copyright possible to protect him here; but this provision in this bill prohibits nothing except when we have got our copyright for a foreign author that somebody in his own country shall secretly strike off an edition of that book and send it over here to destroy his copyright and destroy him and destroy his publisher. That is all.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. The supposition in the case submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts would be just as effective if you were to strike out England from the case absolutely. After an American author has been protected by a copyright here, is some man to surreptitiously print and put on the market books for which he has not paid a copyright? And the Senator asks me if I think that would be fair. Of course it would not be fair. It would not be fair done in the United States and it would not be fair done anywhere else. But this provision in the bill providing for the absolute prohibition of the importation of publications has no relation whatever to taking care of any such case as that or any other one except the barbarity inflicted on commerce, if I may use that phrase.

There is one other suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts that I wish to reply to. He says that I overlook in the bill the provision made for the very difficulty I propose. The language of the bill is:

> And except in the case of persons purchasing for use and not for sale, who import not more than two copies at any one time, in each of which cases the written consent of the proprietor of the copyright, signed in the presence of two witnesses, shall be furnished with each importation.

I admit that you may import an English book for private use, not more than two copies at once, by having the written consent of the owner of the copyright, attested by two witnesses. You can import a book under those circumstances into the United States, but under no other. I insist that any American who wishes to buy an unlimited number of books abroad and bring them here for sale ought to have the right to do so, and the American reader ought to have the right to have foreign publications of any kind brought here and sold, if a proper guard is placed on the importation under the tariff laws, as there is at the present. But why go beyond any step ever taken in any sort of tariff law and absolutely provide for a prohibition to prevent the importation absolutely of a book published abroad? I confess I can not see an excuse or an apology for it.

Mr. BECK. I should like to ask the Senator a question. This, I understand, is a Senate bill—bill of the Senate No. 554.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Yes, sir,

Mr. BECK. The act of 1883 provides that all books coming to this country shall pay a tax of 25 per cent:

> Books, pamphlets, bound or unbound, and all printed matter, not specially enumerated or provided for in this act, engravings, bound or unbound, etchings, illustrated books, maps, and charts, 25 per cent. ad valorem.

I ask whether this Senate bill is not changing the tax laws of this country and making the duty prohibitory?

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. There is no question about it.

Mr. BECK. Can such a bill originate in the Senate?

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I should think not.

Mr. CHACE. Mr. President, we have at present a domestic copyright law, and under the provisions of that law the importation of books copyrighted in this country is prohibited absolutely—precisely the same feature that is in this bill. Now, I ask the Senator from Kentucky what is his explanation, and how does he excuse that? Nobody has ever discovered that that was a defect.

Mr. BECK. All books that are allowed to be used in the country are, under existing law, authorized to be brought into this country by paying a tax of 25 per cent.

Mr. CHACE. The Senator is entirely mistaken. Neither he nor any other man can import a book into this country that is copyrighted here.

Mr. BECK. But English periodicals are not copyrighted here. Our own author is protected for forty-two years against all the world.

Mr. CHACE. But how is he protected? By an absolute prohibition of importation.

Mr. BECK. He is protected by our own copyright law, and no man can import his book or bring it here either in periodical or pamphlet, or anything else, without being fined and imprisoned, as the law provides for the violation of copyright. But this Senate bill now proposes to change the existing tax laws of this country and prohibit all that class of books that can now be brought in by paying a duty of 25 per cent. being brought in at all, and makes it the duty of custom-house officials to destroy them the moment they are found attempting to enter, as though they were smuggled.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I congratulate my friend from Kentucky on the discovery he has made in regard to the rights of the Senate and House of Representatives, respectively. Mr. Clay never made that discovery, and he was a very distinguished Kentuckian. In 1837 he reported a Senate bill with this identical clause, and I call his attention to Mr. Clay's statement in regard to the constitutional power of the Senate:

With respect to the constitutional power to pass the proposed bill the committee entertain no doubt, and Congress, as before stated, has acted on it. The Constitution authorizes Congress "to promote the progress of science and useful arts by securing, for limited times, to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries."

The passage of that Senate bill was advocated by the most distinguished statesmen of the country then members of the Senate and House, and it was reserved for my distinguished friend from Kentucky to raise the point that this is a money bill, which can not originate in the Senate.

The object of this bill is not to raise money to affect taxation. It is a general measure of relief. It is simply protecting property—that and that alone. The Senator knows very well that the question of finance and taxation does not enter into it except as one of the results of general legislation on the part of Congress. That is the whole of it. There is no law passed by Congress but what affects finance and taxation. I say no law. As a reasonable assertion every law we pass here affects the business of the country to a certain extent; and if this be a finance measure all other bills and all other measures that come before the Senate are to the same extent financial measures.

Mr. President, no bill which has ever been introduced into Congress during my term of service of ten years commends itself more thoroughly, and after deliberate investigation, to my judgment and conscience than the pending measure. When we concede—and I take it for granted that every member of this body will concede—that there can be property in intellectual labor and intellectual production, it is conceded that international dishonor rests on the people of the United States under the existing status. What Senator would here stand in his place and say that any citizen of the United States would have the right to rob a foreigner who comes to this country of his personal property in the shape of clothing or other effects? What Senator would dare to put the American people in the position of being committed to so flagrant an outrage on the conscience and judgment of the public as to make such a statement?

The very moment you concede, as we have conceded in the Constitution and laws of the country and in public opinion, that a man's right to the production of his brain is as sacred as the right to his land or his house or his horse or his cattle, you concede that a wrong is being perpetrated under the old and barbaric idea that a foreigner is entitled to nothing in this country except what is given him ex grâtia, and not by any right. It was the doctrine of the old barbarians before the religion under which we hope for a better existence hereafter was created. Jesus of Nazareth brought into this world the declaration that there was a brotherhood of men; that there were great and indisputable principles of right not geographically confined to any portion of the world's surface; and to-day we hear, indirectly if not directly, the expression that no foreigner has any rights in this country except what we choose to give him, and that we can take his property in the shape of literary effort and appropriate it to our own use.

Why, Mr. President, after the adjournment of the Senate yesterday a gentleman called at my residence and presented me this pamphlet. He stated that he was the agent of publishers in the United States, and fifteen thousand of them he said would be almost ruined in their business if this pending bill became a law.

Something has been said here, or if not here, elsewhere, in regard to the tariff in connection with this subject. I want to read to my Democratic friends the argument which is used in this pamphlet thus left with me:

Third. That the American authors would receive less for their work than under the existing copyright law, which protects them; as, under the existing law, American authors can give exclusive rights to publishers, while foreign authors can not do this at present in the United States; but, if they could do so, as proposed in this bill, they would come into direct competition with the American authors and force them to take less for their work than at present.

I understand the doctrine of the Democratic party to be that this Government and its legislation shall not be used to enrich classes; that no man shall seize the powers of government and wrest those powers from their legitimate purposes, the protection of the whole people and their equality before the law, in order to put money into his own pocket; and yet these publishers would say "we are protected now, we are making money now under existing law, and if you change the law and allow foreign productions to come in, you take money away from us." As a Democrat I repudiate the argument; I repudiate the proposition. Why, sir, I should feel myself degraded if for one instant I could contemplate seriously the idea that a man because a foreigner had not the right in this country before the law to own his property which he offers the use of to our own citizens. We have a right to exclude his productions. Not long ago we passed a law that no foreigner should purchase real estate in this country. Suppose we had gone further and said that all existing rights of property in real estate by foreigners should be taken away, would any Senator here have voted for it? Would any Senator have gone on the record in favor of any such law? And yet we have been here for years taking the property of foreigners, admitted to be property, using it for our own purposes, for our own people.

Now, I want to read from an historic document, coming from an American, the author of the American system, Henry Clay, of Kentucky. He made a report to the Senate on Senate bill 233, February 15, 1837, in which he said:

The select committee to whom was referred the address of certain British, and the petition of certain American authors, have, according to order, had the same under consideration, and beg leave now to report:

This is from a high source. I commend it to my Democratic brethren, who can see where the tariff comes in and the protection of foreigners at the expense of American citizens.

1. That by the act of Congress of 1831, being the law now in force regulating copyrights, the benefits of the act are restricted to citizens or residents of the United States, so that no foreigner, residing abroad, can secure a copyright in the United States for any work of which he is the author, however important or valuable it may be. The object of the address and petition, therefore, is to remove this restriction as to British authors, and to allow them to enjoy the benefits of our law.

2. That authors and inventors have, according to the practice among civilized nations, a property in the respective productions of their genius is incontestable, and that this property should be protected as effectually as any other property is by law follows as a legitimate consequence.

Authors and inventors are among the greatest benefactors of mankind. They are often dependent exclusively upon their own mental labors for the means of subsistence, and are frequently, from the nature of their pursuits or the constitutions of their minds, incapable of applying that provident care to worldly affairs which other classes of society are in the habit of bestowing. These considerations give additional strength to their just title to the protection of the law.

3. It being established that literary property is entitled to legal protection, it results that this protection ought to be afforded wherever the property is situated. A British merchant brings or transmits to the United States a bale of merchandise, and the moment it comes within the jurisdiction of our laws they throw around it effectual security. But if the work of a British author is brought to the United States, it may be appropriated by any resident here and republished, without any compensation whatever being made to the author. We should be all shocked if the law tolerated the least invasion of the rights of property in the case of the merchandise, whilst those which justly belong to the works of authors are exposed to daily violation, without the possibility of their invoking the aid of the laws.

4. The committee think that this distinction in the condition of the two descriptions of property is not just, and that it ought to be remedied by some safe and cautious amendment of the law. Already the principle has been adopted in the patent laws of extending their benefits to foreign inventions or improvements. It is but carrying out the same principle to extend the benefits of our copyright laws to foreign authors. In relation to the subjects of Great Britain and France it will be but a measure of reciprocal justice; for, in both of those countries, our authors may enjoy that protection of their laws for literary property which is denied to their subjects here.

So far as I am concerned, Mr. President, even if this protection were not given to our people, I would be inclined to vote for a measure such as the pending bill, upon the broad principle of right. I say that it is piracy, it is robbery, for us to take possession of what we ourselves admit to be property, simply because the man who created it is not a citizen or an inhabitant of the United States.

Since Mr. Clay made that report an international copyright union has been established, and to-day the United States is the only civilized country in the world outside of that organization. We enjoy to-day the unenviable notoriety of standing alone in the assertion that when a foreigner puts his foot on American soil he loses his right to the highest property in the world, the fruit of his own genius. Sir, if Robert Burns were living to-day his immortal poems of the Cotter's Saturday Night and Tam O'Shanter would be republished and sold for ten cents a copy on the streets of New York, and Burns would be without compensation and might be a pauper on the cold charity of the world. All the protection we give to legitimate publication is protection to authorship. It is protection to this kind of property. The productions of genius belong to the commonwealth of letters. They are not circumscribed by territorial limits. While I occupy public position and have a vote, I will never sanction the national outrage of the last fifty years on this subject.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I have repressed so far a considerable temptation to speak on this bill, because it seemed to me that the purpose of the Senate was all right as far as I could discover from the indications, and I was afraid that I might injure the bill by prolonging the consideration of it more than I could help it by speech. But I do not like to let the occasion pass without putting on record at least my own opinion, the opinion that I have entertained for a long time, that the honor and the interest of the American people alike require the inauguration of the policy which this bill proposes to enact. If there be one thing on the face of the earth which beyond all the discussions of economy, of philosophy, of social science, must be admitted to be property in any individual it is the product of his brain, either in literary work or in an invention. There is a great deal to be said against the right of individuals to monopolize land, and there are shrewd arguments, sometimes difficult to answer, that you have no more right to take up to yourself the exclusive use of land than you have of the atmosphere or the sea. There is a great deal to be said against the right to inherit personal property or real property or to transmit it to your children by will. These things, all of them, are the creatures of artificial legislation adopted by the experience of mankind for the best interests of society. Every dollar which a man owns of personal property and every foot he gets of real estate is obtained from somebody else by some artificial process which is the creature of human law and depends on it for its sanction. But the product of a man's brain is his creation; it is his own. It is as much his as the milk in the mother's bosom is hers.

Now we stand nearly alone among civilized countries in denying to the foreign author who confers upon the people of this country the great benefit of a new creation, in denying, as the Senator from Missouri so aptly said, to Robert Burns, or Tennyson, or Macaulay the property in that thing which when he has created and while it is his property is also the chief source of benefit, of blessing, of benediction to mankind.

Mr. President, this legislation is required by the very genius of the American people and of the American Constitution. If we found it nowhere else we should be bound by the principles which lie at the bottom of our own society to establish it here. The American Constitution declares by a statement of principle, which is as applicable to the case of the foreign author as it is to our own, that it promotes the interest of literature and of invention to secure to the author and the inventor for a reasonable and limited period the property in the product of his brain. Our country should be the first in honor to set the example to mankind of a respect paid to men of letters by their contemporaries. Down to a period long after the American Revolution a man of letters, unless he were also a man of rank and a man of wealth, was treated with very little respect in European capitals, even in England. I suppose Senators are familiar with the story of the astonishment and contempt with which Sir Alexander Boswell, the old Scotch laird, heard that his son James was associated with Dr. Johnson. He thought the whole family rank and credit of the name was disgraced forever. What he had heard of Jamie's doing in London around with an "auld dominie" was Sir Alexander Boswell's complaint to his neighbor, and Dr. Johnson himself put on record in those touching lines the condition of the craft of which he was the leading member in his young days:

> There mark what ills the scholar's life assail—
> Toil, envy, want, the patron, and the jail.

It was even as late as Bulwer's time that he said that an Englishman of letters had to go abroad every year or two to keep up a decent self-respect in his own bosom. But from the very first we made Dr. Franklin, our foremost man of letters, our foremost man, with the single exception of Washington, in the estimation of the American people. Mr. President, until a time long after the adoption of our Constitution you can hardly point to a great English man of letters not a man of rank or not the companion of men of rank, who attained to any considerable respect in the estimation of his own countrymen. They did not even preserve the particulars of his life. Take Shakespeare; take Milton. Milton sold his great work for £5, and died in blindness and in want.

What are the objections that have come to this bill? All the objections which have been suggested on either side of the Chamber are that this bill is somehow or other to interfere with the profits of the American publishers or the American people by reason of putting some hindrance or obstacle in the execution of the process of selling this most precious property of the foreign author. No man has raised his voice to deny that justice, honor, respect for property require from us this legislation; but it is said you will not get your books quite so cheap or the profits of the American publisher will not be quite as great. Well, I do not believe that. I do not believe that while the receivers of stolen goods are willing to sell their wares a little cheaper than the lawful and honest trader, any community ever yet existed or ever will exist which will find it on the whole for its profit to deal with them.

The Senator from Kentucky put the question yesterday whether if we grant a copyright to foreign authors we shall not find that here an unpurchasable edition, one not within the means of the average of our people, will alone be published by the foreign author. The answer to that is that that question will be settled just as it is settled in reference to the products of the American author, by the interest of the people and the demand of the market. Of nothing is it so true as of books that the wider circulation at a low price brings to the author not merely the fame, which is to be after all his chief and principal reward, but brings to the author also the largest income and pecuniary return. I think we are by this bill to determine that the thinking interest, the interest of the brain, the interest of the idea, the interest which elevates and benefits the soul and the intellect of mankind, is as much an interest to be regarded and protected and cared for in legislation as the shipping interest or the manufacturing interest or the trading interest of this country.

Now, Mr. President, I have said, I believe, all I care to say on the subject. I rose not to argue the question, but merely to put myself upon record in the debate. Nothing has been suggested and nothing will be suggested which can wipe out or wink out of sight the simple proposition which was so eloquently put by the honorable Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], that the question is whether it is longer for the honor or the dignity of the American people that when a man has created an invention or written a book simply because he is a foreigner it shall be permitted any longer in this country to rob him of the property which our Constitution recognizes as property in our own citizens in that production. Refine as you will, the Tenth Commandment will not budge any continued disregard.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I am not much disposed to argue upon the general merits of the bill, for it has seemed to me that they are indisputable. A German mechanic may invent a fish-hook upon which he may accumulate a fortune, but Goethe and Humboldt could not make and send to the United States their immortal and eternal works. A book-binder over there might invent an excellent book-binding machine and a practical printer might invent an excellent type-setting machine, and both might make their fortunes out of binding and printing. A new book, equal, we will suppose, to Paradise Lost or the Iliad, may be written, and the author can not get a penny out of it; and that is exactly the way the law stands now.

So it seems to me the general purpose of the bill can not be argued; and yet I confess my blood was stirred by the generous argument of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST]. It appears to me as plain a proposition as the command against stealing.

I admit there are of course some embarrassments about the precise details. An English author can copyright his book over here, and nevertheless many men have an intense desire to get the original edition of that book, sometimes because it is published in better style, with better binding or finer illustrations, than the republications over here. I would not stand in the way of the gentleman who desired to make his library a perfect library of first editions, or the public library that would desire to do that. That was one of the difficulties in drawing the bill; but I confess that I think the committee has got around it as well as possible. I think the manner in which they have avoided that must be satisfactory to those who are most scrupulous about protecting American labor in the matter, for this bill is satisfactory to the trade unions and to the publishers. It is satisfactory, too, most happily and singularly, also to the authors. The singularity is in the bill being acceptable to everybody whose interests are to be affected by it.

Under these circumstances I think it is a matter of common rejoicing that we are to remove this stain from our legislation with such general satisfaction

It is quite natural that we should desire to print these books in the United States, and in that we are not differing from other countries that have been far ahead of us in establishing international copyright. If you go over from the continent to England with a trunkful of Bohn's very excellent edition of authors you must leave them behind you under the risk of forfeiting every one of them as a protection for an English copyright book; they will seize them at the custom-house. They will look as sharply for them as for whisky or tobacco. You must leave every such book; and it is a matter of every-day experience that Americans do not land at Liverpool without leaving on board, or throwing away, or giving to the stewards and the servants their American editions of English copyrighted books, if the American in his cabin has a 10 or 20 cent edition of a book that is published in England at a greater price and upon which the author gets something. We do not find any fault with that law. We are simply proposing to continue legislation which is universal abroad. It does not pertain to books alone. For example, Gatling and Hotchkiss patented very valuable improvements in fire-arms in this country and patented them in Germany and in England and in France, and while the gun might be prohibited in France it would not be prohibited in England, and nevertheless there was no market for it except at the hands of the government.

The French Government, the German Government, and the English Government require Hotchkiss to establish manufactories in those three countries. The French would not deal with him unless he made all his guns in France. So he put up a large establishment and a profitable one there. He did the same in Germany, and was about establishing a manufactory in England when he died, and the work was continued there, and the factories there are turning out guns that an American invented and that are paid for to his family. Who has found any fault with that? The Americans certainly did not find any fault with them for it. That is the general practice.

I think we have escaped the difficulty suggested by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] remarkably well in the bill. I sympathize with him in the desire that we should have a right somehow to buy a copy of an original edition.

Mr. CHACE. Will it interrupt the Senator if I say a word?

Mr. HAWLEY. No, sir.

Mr. CHACE. That is fully provided for.

Mr. HAWLEY. I say the committee has happily met that difficulty in the bill.

Mr. CHACE. And I want to say further that section 2505 of the Revised Statutes provides for public and other libraries that they may import books for their own use.

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not know that I care to say anything further, for I see no practical difficulty and no reasonable objection to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DOLPH in the chair). The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 2083) to provide for the establishment of a Bureau of Animal Industry, and to facilitate the exportation of live-stock and their products, to extirpate contagious pleuro-pneumonia and other diseases among domestic animals, and for other purposes.

Mr. CHACE. I ask unanimous consent to continue the consideration of the copyright bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island asks unanimous consent to continue the bill which has been under consideration.

Mr. PLUMB. I think I shall have to object.

Mr. PALMER. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. BECK. One moment. I asked this morning that the matter might go over until I could look into some reports that I had not been able to find till last night. I have now before me a very able report made in 1872 by Mr. Morrill, of Maine, indorsed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], not only answering very thoroughly the beautiful argument, as far as oratory is concerned, of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], but I think all that has been said on the other side, and I should like time to present that to the Senate against this whole scheme. It calls it a monopoly, and denounces it, and reported adversely to the Senate upon it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] had the floor, and suspended to allow the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business. The Senator from Connecticut requested unanimous consent to proceed with the consideration of the bill, but there was objection.

Mr. HAWLEY. I beg pardon. The Senator from Rhode Island desired it. He has the bill in charge.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair asks pardon. It was the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. CALL. I hope the objection will be withdrawn, and that we shall be allowed to go on with the copyright bill.

Mr. BECK. I will not withdraw the objection.

Mr. CHACE. I move that the Senate proceed with the consideration of the copyright bill notwithstanding the objection.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President——

Mr. CHACE. I hope the Senator from Michigan will let his bill be laid aside temporarily.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state the question. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE] moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill which has been under consideration during the morning hour, the copyright bill.

Mr. PALMER. I hope that motion will not prevail.

Mr. PLUMB. Let the Chair state the question again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island will please restate his motion.

Mr. CHACE. I do not wish to antagonize the Senator from Michigan. It is not improper for me to remark that I understood him to say this morning that he would consent to the copyright bill being considered. I hope we shall get a vote on it before very long. I do not wish to press my motion, but I hope the Senator from Michigan will consent that his bill be laid aside temporarily until we can get a vote on the copyright bill. It seems to me it will not take a great deal of time.

Mr. PALMER. I should willingly give way if I thought it would expedite matters, but this bill will be talked upon all this afternoon. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] will have an argument to make to-morrow, and I think the thing had better be condensed into an hour or two to-morrow rather than take up the whole of this afternoon. There is no Senator I would rather accommodate than the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. BECK. I have just laid my hand on another report bearing on this subject. I can in half an hour to-morrow do what I think would require two hours to do to-day, because I have not had time to read all the reports yet. Perhaps a few lines of each will be all I shall present to-morrow. I do not think there is any great urgency for going on with the bill to-day. I have not spoken before. I will not take over twenty or thirty minutes to-morrow, but I might take two hours this afternoon if I am forced into the discussion.

Mr. CHACE. Very well. I will not press my motion if the Senator from Kentucky wishes time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island withdraws his motion.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 1483) for the registry of the barges Albert M. Condor, and Adelante.

The message also requested the Senate to return to the House of Representatives the bill (H. R. 8117) granting a pension to Mrs. Juliet G. Howe.

The message further announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 9430) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to award a gold medal of the first class to Capt. Thomas Sampson, of New York City, for rescuing five boys from drowning, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

AMENDMENT TO INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MITCHELL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2083) to provide for the establishment of a Bureau of Animal Industry, and to facilitate the exportation of live-stock and their products, to extirpate contagious pleuro-pneumonia and other diseases among domestic animals, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment offered by Mr. PALMER as a substitute for the bill.

Mr. HALE. I wish to ask the Senator from Michigan who has charge of this bill whether his substitute embodies all the amendments to the original bill that were made before by the Senate.

Mr. PALMER. I think that it does.

Mr. HALE. There were certain amendments that were suggested to the Senate, and perhaps offered by my colleague in my absence.

Mr. PALMER. I can not tell now but what there may have been some clerical changes, but the only changes in this substitute have been those that were required to meet the constitutional scruples of many Senators. It was a little too radical as we had it originally, but all the amendments, I think, are incorporated in this substitute.

Mr. HALE. I have not had time to examine it.

Mr. FRYE. They are incorporated. I have examined the amendment.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President, I do not propose to make a speech on this matter, but merely to make a few explanations. I want to describe the difference between this bill creating a new Bureau of Animal Industry and the old bill. In the bill before us the President, instead of the Commissioner of Agriculture, appoints an efficient board, large enough to personally superintend the work in the field, instead of directing it from Washington. That is the most material thing in the change, and it is the thing that is demanded most by the practical cattlemen of the country. Then, the board have authority to meet the needs of the disease with ample force, money, and power of quarantine, subject to the rights of the States.

The compensation of the board is $4,000 apiece; that is, for each member of the board, or $16,000. It differs from the present law, which gives $3,000 to the chief and $3,650 to each of his coadjutors or agents in the field. The board can pay for cattle instead of for inquiry as made under the original act. Texas fever may be handled as in the judgment of the board is necessary in the new bill, and is not exempt, as under old act. Rules must be made by the board and approved by the President, instead of made, approved, and promulgated by the Commissioner of Agriculture. When any State prefers to handle the disease in a manner acceptable to the board the Government will co-operate or pay the bills, as seems advisable.

No extraordinary powers are granted or the rights of States encroached upon, as was claimed by the Commissioner under the appropriation clause of 1887. The law is clear and its enforcement fully backed by penalties. The bill looks to the earliest possible removal of restrictions on our foreign commerce through official notice of cessation of disease.

That is the distinction between the present act and the one that the committee are now recommending for passage. The bill creating the present Bureau of Animal Industry was regarded as provisional and tentative, as will be seen by an extract from a letter of the Attorney-General of April 2, 1885, to the Commissioner of Agriculture.

The Attorney-General says:

> The act in question being, as probably was anticipated, the first of a series upon that subject, is consequently somewhat general and merely tentative in its provisions.

And again:

> As the results of experience and observation are accumulated upon the topic of which you speak no doubt more general legislation is intended.

The anticipations have been verified by the demands of the cattlemen of the country who appeared here last winter, and at whose instigation and on whose persuasion the Senate passed what is known as the Miller-Carey bill, a much more radical bill than this, by a vote of 31 to 19. However, that failed, and the authority that the bureau has been acting under is derived from some legislation in an appropriation clause

The language of the appropriation in 1887 was:

For carrying out the provisions of the act of May 29, 1884, establishing the Bureau of Animal Industry, $500,000; and the Commissioner of Agriculture is hereby authorized to use any part of this sum he may deem necessary or expedient, and in such manner as he may think best, to prevent the spread of pleuro-pneumonia, and for this purpose to employ as many persons as he may deem necessary, and to expend any part of this sum in the purchase and destruction of diseased or exposed animals and the quarantine of the same whenever in his judgment it is essential to prevent the spread of pleuro-pneumonia from one State into another, $100,000 of this sum or so much thereof as may be necessary to be immediately available.

I would say that the report of the Bureau of Animal Industry for 1885 shows that the bureau confined itself to and paid for investigation only. It was the same in 1886; but in the fall of 1886 there broke out in the city of Chicago in a very virulent form the disease of pleuro-pneumonia, and that gave rise to the legislation of the winter of 1887, and to the appropriation, and the legislation in that appropriation clause when the bill failed.

Now, to show how the Commissioner regards legislation on the subject, I will read from his address at Kansas City. Hon. Norman J. Colman, Commissioner of Agriculture, in an address made at Kansas City, October 31, 1887, before the Consolidated Cattle-Growers' Association of the United States, said:

The act of Congress creating the Bureau of Animal Industry was deficient in several particulars. It limited the number of employés to twenty; it gave no power to destroy diseased or exposed animals; it limited the expenditure of money to quarantining and disinfecting herds and premises in States whose executive officers would co-operate with the Bureau of Animal Industry; it appropriated an amount of money insufficient to accomplish any practical results; and, lastly, it failed to provide proper penalties for the enforcement of the means adopted to extirpate this disease.

It was hoped that these defects would be corrected at the last session of Congress, but the unfortunate division of sentiment between the two different measures apparently prevented legislation which might otherwise have been obtained. The friends of the Bureau of Animal Industry, however, succeeded in obtaining at the very close of the session an appropriation of $500,000, the first that has been sufficiently large to be of practical use in stamping out disease, and at the same time some additional authority was conferred upon the bureau in the appropriating act. The limit to the number of employés was removed, the right to kill both diseased and exposed animals was granted, and money could be expended in States even though the authorities failed to co-operate with the bureau.

You can see what construction the Commissioner of Agriculture puts on the legislation in that appropriation clause in this speech:

Immediately after the passage of this act, and in consultation with the Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry, I prepared rules and regulations for the suppression of contagious pleuro-pneumonia, in accordance with section 3 of the act of Congress approved May 29, 1884; and these rules and regulations, by virtue of the authority contained in that section, became of equal force as if made by Congress itself.

It seems that the Commissioner of Agriculture considers himself a legislature as far as making rules and regulations which have the authority of law.

These rules I certified to the governors of all the States and Territories, and asked their co-operation in enforcing them. The governors of thirty-one States and Territories accepted these rules and regulations, and promised the assistance of the police officers of their respective States and Territories to secure their enforcement.

I also read from a letter of January 20, 1888, written by Commissioner Colman to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry on this subject:

As the power to do this work now being done by the Bureau of Animal Industry comes in a large measure from the appropriation act of March 3, 1887, it would be advisable that the organic act of the bureau should be so amended as to include this authority and thus make it permanent, and not dependent on temporary legislation from year to year.

This is what is intended by the pending bill.

I would suggest, therefore, that certain amendments be made to the act of May 29, 1884, as follows:

In the first section of the act the limitation of the force of the bureau to "twenty persons at any one time," should be stricken out. The same section should give, in addition to the powers now granted, the right to inspect, quarantine, and disinfect all animals or premises and the right to enter upon any grounds for these purposes; also the right of condemnation, appraisement, compensation, and slaughter of any animals found to be diseased or exposed to the disease.

In section 3 of the present act the limitation of the expenditure of money to investigation, disinfection, and quarantine measures should be removed and authority given to expend money for all the purposes mentioned in the first section.

Section 6 should be so amended that no person can move any bovine animal from a district declared in quarantine by the Commissioner of Agriculture to any other State or Territory without a permit from an inspector of the Bureau of Animal Industry.

Section 9 should be amended so that it shall be the duty of the several United States district attorneys to defend all officers of the Bureau sued for acts committed by them in the discharge of their official duties, in addition to what the section now provides the district attorneys shall do.

A new section should be added to the act providing that the Commissioner of Agriculture shall declare in quarantine all districts in which pleuro-pneumonia is found to exist, and that notice thereof shall be published in one or more newspapers. Also, upon the extirpation of the disease, he shall give notice in like manner of this fact and of the removal of the quarantine.

The committee, in the bill which has been submitted as a substitute, have not taken any such radical steps as are proposed by the Commissioner of Agriculture, because it was considered that they had no constitutional right to do so. They have kept as near as possible to the powers granted by the clause "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States" in the Constitution, and, I think, have invaded none of the rights of the States. However, that will come up for discussion hereafter.

The question is now whether we shall have a Bureau of Animal Industry which shall be capable of coping with this and other diseases of live-stock, or whether we shall allow the diseases which threaten the live-stock of the United States at the present time to extend, or whether we shall continue an irregular kind of legislation in appropriation acts under which the Commissioner of Agriculture may do things or assume powers that are certainly unconstitutional.

The thing of greatest importance, however, at the present time is the establishment of the commission. The question is whether we shall have a dictator at the head of the Bureau of Animal Industry, with general powers conceded and assumed, as under the appropriation clause of 1887, or whether we shall have a commission with limited and well-defined powers, as is suggested in this bill.

The cattle-men of the country, and all who have given any attention to this subject that I have conversed with, and who had not taken sides from personal friendship or interest, believe that this can be handled much better by a commission, one of whom shall remain here and the rest of whom shall be in the field, than by one man who has a thousand other duties and who regards this as a subordinate thing in his department. It is an interest, as I said some days ago, representing $2,400,000,000. It not only represents that, but it represents the future food supply of our country as far as meat is concerned, and it seems to me that this bill and the establishment of a bureau and a board that shall be effective is one of the most important things that will come before Congress at this session.

The Commissioner, I believe, dislikes the idea of a commission. I do not know that I blame him for it. As it is now he commands the whole thing. The patronage is very large which he has in his hands, and I do not suppose he differs from most men in liking power and the ability to grant favors; but the committee believe that a commission of one man at Chicago or St. Louis or Kansas City, for instance, and one man at New York and one man in Texas would be much more efficient in stamping out this disease; and here I will read from the report of the live-stock board of Illinois the practical difficulty in the way of having the suppression of cattle diseases managed from Washington. I will take selections, and their relevancy will appear after I have read a little, although it may not at first. I am going to read in regard to cattle quarantine in the Empire Distillery stables at Chicago, from the report of the live-stock commissioners of Illinois to Governor Oglesby, February 27, 1888:

The 207 cattle quarantined in the Empire Distillery stables were not then slaughtered, none having died, to our knowledge, of contagious pleuro-pneumonia, nor shown signs of being affected with that disease. An agreement was made with the owner of the cattle, allowing them to remain in the stables until the latter part of the month of February following, on condition that he would then have them slaughtered under the supervision of the State veterinarian and his assistants, without expense to the State. The owner of these cattle absented himself from the State and did not return until April, when the cattle were slaughtered, and 117 were found affected with contagious pleuro-pneumonia in its chronic form. We desire to call especial attention to these cattle. They had been in quarantine for seven months. No fresh cattle were added during that time, no deaths occurred, and no acute case of contagious pleuro-pneumonia existed. The cattle apparently were healthy, fattened well on their feed, but notwithstanding this the post-mortem showed that fully 117 were chronic encysted cases of pleuro-pneumonia, capable, upon the breaking down of the cysts, of communicating the disease to healthy animals, showing clearly the necessity of a strict watch over an infected district for a long time after the disease has apparently disappeared.

Notwithstanding those animals had been quarantined for seven months they were liable to spread contagion any day when they were let out of those stables. The poisonous matter had become encysted in the lungs, and when the tissues should become weakened either by incidental sickness, by fatigue, by over-feeding or under-feeding, they were liable to break down, and they would immediately become the center of infection. Notwithstanding that state of facts, I think that the quarantine on animals imported is now only three months. They are only compelled to hold them in quarantine when they come into New York, Boston, Philadelphia, or any of the ports of the United States, for three months, and we are undoubtedly importing to-day pleuro-pneumonia from Great Britain.

Here were animals apparently healthy, which had been in quarantine seven months, and none of them had ever been affected with the disease but two, which had been exposed; but when they were killed one hundred and seventeen, or over half of them, were found to be possible centers of infection. I think it shows that we need a little new blood, a little new vigor, and a little more energy in the Bureau of Animal Industry, and in the remarks that I am about to make I wish to cast no reflection upon Commissioner Colman, whom I regard very highly, nor on Dr. Salmon, and I do not take any stock in any remarks reflecting upon them personally which I may read from this report. This report was undoubtedly gotten up while some feeling existed on the part of the live-stock board of Illinois, between whom and the Bureau of Animal Industry there had been considerable friction. Here is an illustration of the way things were managed in Chicago:

Dr. D. E. Salmon, chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry, on his departure from Chicago, informed the board that he had appointed Dr. M. R. Trumbower to represent him here, to which appointment this board objected on the ground that Dr. Trumbower was an inebriate and unfit to occupy the position named, and had been guilty of dishonest practices while engaged in stamping out contagious pleuro-pneumonia in Missouri. These facts the chief of the Bureau knew well, and requested this board to notify him if Dr. Trumbower continued such practices, promising in such case to immediately remove him. On two occasions we notified Dr. Salmon of Trumbower's insobriety while on duty, but he was continued in his position against our protest; and in order to retain our self-respect and to enable us to suppress the disease we were compelled to withdraw his authority to act as an assistant State veterinarian in Illinois.

One of the incidents of friction under the present management of the Bureau of Animal Industry. It is just as impossible to manage the suppression of this disease at a thousand miles from Washington under this system as it is for a man to play on the piano with the keys of the piano two feet beyond the reach of his fingers. I read further from this report:

After slaughtering the cattle in the distillery stables and on the Harvey farm, the next step was to quarantine all the cattle within the area where the disease had extended, that inspection might be had, and the diseased and exposed animals slaughtered. There was no other way of determining the number of diseased and exposed animals. The area taken for quarantine was greater than was absolutely necessary, but the board deemed it better to err on the side of safety, regardless of a little extra cost. The system adopted in quarantining cattle was to note a description of the animal, take the name and address of the owner, and record the same in a record book made for that purpose, serving a written or printed notice of quarantine upon the owner or person in charge, and filing a duplicate notice in the office.

To do this work there were employed twenty deputy sheriffs and three veterinarians, paid by the Bureau of Animal Industry out of an appropriation made by Congress to extirpate the disease of contagious pleuro-pneumonia. This work of quarantining commenced December 14, 1886, from which date to February 1, 1887, but 1,217 head of cattle had been quarantined in 357 stables, at a cost to the United States Government of above $3,300, or $2.75 per animal. Nearly seven weeks of valuable time had passed during which the disease was allowed to spread rampant in the infected district, and the board made inquiry why so few cattle and stables had been quarantined, and were informed an order had been issued from Washington directing the deputy sheriffs and veterinarians to report to the chief deputy at the office of the bureau in Chicago, where they were detained the greater part of the day awaiting the arrival of Dr. Trumbower, to be assigned to duty. The board viewed with disgust the useless expenditure of money by the Bureau of Animal Industry and with alarm the liability of the disease spreading beyond its control, and knowing the law under which we were acting, as well as the rules of co-operation signed by your excellency and the chief of the bureau, required these men to work under the direction of this board (see articles of co-operation, rule 4), and that the people of the country and your excellency held this board responsible for the suppression of the disease, an order was issued directing the deputy sheriffs and veterinarians to report at the office of the board at 8 o'clock every morning, when they would be assigned to duty. This order was made known to the officials at Washington—

This is the statement of the Illinois live-stock board, as I remarked before, to the governor of that State—

This order was made known to the officials at Washington, and Dr. D. E. Salmon, chief of the bureau, addressed a communication to this board in which he says:

"I am informed that Mr. McChesney, a member of your board, who seems to be exercising the functions of an executive officer, has ordered the deputy sheriffs, paid by this Department, to report directly to him instead of to the chief deputy designated by this Department to keep their time and report the nature of their duties. I have the honor to direct your attention to these facts, and to state that, unless they are speedily corrected, it will become my duty to represent to the honorable Commissioner of Agriculture that it is impossible to cooperate with your board, and to recommend a different line of action for the protection of the other States from the contagion which exists in Illinois. I shall be very sorry indeed to be forced to do this, but it is simply wasting time and money for the Department to endeavor to co-operate under these circumstances."

Such was the system of co-operation by the Bureau of Animal Industry with the State board of live-stock commissioners of Illinois in suppressing contagious pleuro-pneumonia. After considering the gravity of the situation, we made an earnest appeal to the Legislature, then in session, for an appropriation to enable us to quarantine the cattle. A bill was drawn, presented, and passed both houses, with an emergency clause, and this board, with fourteen men, in thirty-five days, quarantined and registered 10,192 cattle in over 7,000 stables, at a cost to the State of less than 10 cents per animal, thus placing that kind of cordon about the pest and preventing the further spread of the disease.

It had cost the Bureau of Animal Industry $2.75 a head; it cost the live stock board of Illinois 10 cents a head. I merely cite these cases to show the difficulty of managing anything of this kind at points so remote as Chicago; and the disease is liable at any time to break out at points more remote.

During the quarantining of cattle, and previous to the time the Government commenced paying for slaughtered animals, the board had above 2,700 diseased and exposed animals slaughtered under the supervision of the State veterinarian and his assistants, on permits granted the owners and without a dollar's expense to the State. This work was noiselessly done by the board, and at the time they were censured by many people and a portion of the press for the apparent delay in stamping out the disease and with being inefficient officers.

A little further on the report says:

The reverse side of this picture is equally interesting.

It does not relate to what I have been reading, however.

Cattle in many stables were examined and quarantined by these bureau veterinarians and pronounced healthy, when in fact, subsequent post-mortem examinations showed they were diseased with contagious pleuro-pneumonia, both in acute and chronic forms, and this board was forced to employ competent veterinarians to go over the work done by the employés of the Bureau of Animal Industry. Such was the assistance rendered this board by the Bureau of Animal Industry in stamping out contagious pleuro-pneumonia till Professor James Law, of Cornell University, appeared and took the place of Dr. Trumbower.

* * * The Congress which adjourned March 3, 1887, made an appropriation of $500,000; to be used by the Bureau of Animal Industry, under direction of the Commissioner of Agriculture, in stamping out contagious pleuro-pneumonia. The Commissioner of Agriculture was aware that this disease existed in Chicago in its most virulent form, and that Chicago was recognized as the gateway of the cattle industry of the United States; and although he knew we were laboring with an insufficient appropriation to stamp out the disease, yet, under all these circumstances, he failed to use any of the money so appropriated here until the 20th of April, and not until we had written him demanding that he use such appropriation for the purpose of assisting us in stamping out the disease in Cook County. At the urgent request of prominent cattle-men in Illinois and other States, the Department of Agriculture sent Professor James Law, of Cornell University, as its chief inspector for Illinois to Chicago, to co-operate with us in our work, and he assisted in stamping out the disease in as rapid a manner as he could under the hampering influences of the Bureau of Animal Industry.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to ask the Senator from Michigan a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. PALMER. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. I could not catch all that the Senator read owing to some confusion in the Chamber. I desire to ask him whether the pleuro-pneumonia in Chicago, about which he is reading, was or has been stamped out?

Mr. CULLOM. I think I can answer that it has been stamped out.

Mr. GEORGE. It has been stamped out?

Mr. CULLOM. I do not understand that there is anything of that disease there now.

Mr. PALMER. It is so considered; but they do not know at what time it may break out. Cook County, Illinois, now is——

Mr. GEORGE. It is understood, then, that it is stamped out. Now, I will ask the Senator——

Mr. PALMER. If the Senator will let me answer his question I will state that it is considered by superficial observers as stamped out. It may be stamped out. No one can tell. Cook County is not regarded by other States as a safe point to import cattle from, and Nebraska, to-day, as I understand it, has put Cook County and the State of New York under quarantine. It is a paper quarantine. To be sure they have no right to do it under the Constitution, but they can annoy breeders and dealers if they bring cattle from Cook County or from the State of New York. Although the Senator from Illinois says it is considered that the disease has been stamped out, I do not suppose that there is any certainty but what it may break out there to-morrow, a week hence, or six months hence.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator said that it was considered by superficial observers that the disease was stamped out in Chicago. I should like to know to whom he applies the term "superficial observers," whether to the agents of the Agricultural Department or whether he applies that term to the city agents or the State agents or the agents of the cattle board in Chicago?

Mr. PALMER. "Superficial observers" is hardly a generic term. It does not apply to classes, nor does it mean any particular vocation.

Mr. GEORGE. Then I will put the question——

Mr. PALMER. Let me answer the question. It would naturally be inferred that men who had dealt with this disease among cattle would be more conversant with it, and would be more doubtful as to the disease being stamped out than those who merely saw the cattle and had heard that there were no cases within the last three months. The quarantine on the seaboard was only for three months. The people would naturally infer, if the quarantine was for only three months, that that would be enough to eliminate the disease, and yet here is an illustration that I have read from the Empire Distillery stables, in Chicago, where the animals had been quarantined for seven months and then were killed, and out of two hundred and seven animals one hundred and seventeen were found to have what are called encysted lungs, the germ of the disease walled in by encysted tissues, just the same as a bullet sometimes is in the human tissues, and the walls of that cyst are liable to break down at any time, and each animal become the center of infection. On that very account I think that the commission is demanded. There should be a man at Chicago all the time. There should be trusty men, men of character and men of position, put at these great cattle centers, men to whom the country would look up and to whose judgment the people would defer in matters pertaining to this disease.

Mr. GEORGE. Who did the stamping out there? Was it done by the Agricultural Department or by some authorities of the State of Illinois?

Mr. PALMER. It was done by the State board of Illinois, with the aid of Professor Law, than whom no man stands higher in veterinary science throughout the United States, and who was sent there by the Bureau of Animal Industry at the solicitation of the live-stock board of Illinois. In regard to stamping out the disease, I will say in justice to the Agricultural Department or the Bureau of Animal Industry that until the appropriation clause of March 3, 1887, they could not pay for cattle, but the live-stock board of Illinois had $47,000 at their disposal with which they could pay for cattle.

Mr. CULLOM. That was an appropriation by the State of Illinois?

Mr. PALMER. Yes, by the State.

Mr. GEORGE. All I want to get at is whether the authorities of the State of Illinois concur in the statement made by the Senator from Illinois that the disease is stamped out.

Mr. PALMER. Prima facie it is stamped out; but you can not tell whether it is stamped out effectively or not. No one knows how soon it may break out again.

Mr. GEORGE. There is no disease visible there at this time, is there?

Mr. PALMER. I think not.

Mr. CULLOM. If the Senator from Michigan will allow me to make a remark, I will say that the statement he last made is the truth about it, as I understand. There is no pleuro-pneumonia among the cattle of Illinois that I know of, and none that I think the State authorities of Illinois would say that they know of. I do not think there is any disease there.

Mr. GEORGE. Are the State authorities as competent to decide that question as the authorities here?

Mr. CULLOM. The State authorities are just as competent as any other State authorities; and so far as their preparation and arrangements for the ascertainment of the condition of the cattle there, they are perhaps better qualified than in any other State, for the reason that there has been that disease there, which resulted in the killing of a good many cattle and in the expenditure of a good deal of money on the part of the State, and I am not sure but also on the part of the United States. There was very great difficulty and very great loss to the State of Illinois and to the country generally on account of the disease which existed there for a period of time. So far as appearances go, so far as it can be ascertained by outside examination——

Mr. GEORGE. And by skilled examination?

Mr. CULLOM. And by skilled men appointed for the purpose, there does not seem to exist any pleuro-pneumonia among cattle in Illinois at this time.

Mr. GEORGE. I understand now that this stamping out of the disease was mainly done by the authorities of the State of Illinois, and under their superintendence and supervision?

Mr. CULLOM. Very largely so.

Mr. GEORGE. And with their money?

Mr. CULLOM. Very largely so; but at the same time I desire to say that the Department of Agriculture here, through its Commissioner and men in connection with that Department, was co-operating with the State authorities in bringing about the condition of things that exists there to-day.

Mr. BLAIR. If the Senator will pardon me, I heard most of the testimony upon this matter, and I certainly got the impression that the efficient work in the State of Illinois was done by the Department of Agriculture and they should receive the credit of having accomplished it. It was said that they accomplished the work after dire opposition on the part of the authorities or influences at Chicago; and in fact Illinois was only enabled in the end to stamp out the disease so efficiently as it has been stamped out, at least to all appearances, by the effort of the national authorities, paid for almost wholly by the national money. That is the way I understand it.

Mr. CULLOM. So far as the remarks of the Senator from New Hampshire are concerned, there was a little friction, if you please, between the authorities of the State of Illinois and some men who were sent there in the first instance by the Government of the United States or the Agricultural Department; but, as I understand it, that disappeared and the State authorities and national authorities co-operated fully and freely, and the result was the disappearance of the disease so far as I know.

Mr. GEORGE. That is the point I want to make to the Senate, that by the co-operation of the Agricultural Department and of the authorities of the State of Illinois, under the law as it now exists, when there was a great deal of pleuro-pneumonia at Chicago, so far as science now can discover, through this co-operation that disease has been thoroughly stamped out. That is the point I want to make.

Mr. CULLOM. I have nothing further to say about that.

Mr. McPHERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. PALMER. Certainly; I like to have gentlemen take part in the debate and show interest in the question.

Mr. McPHERSON. I should like to have the Senator from Michigan, if he will be so kind, give me certain information, and I presume he has it. Is there a State west of here in which he knows that any pleuro-pneumonia exists to-day, or any of the diseases which he proposes to stamp out by the bill now under consideration?

Mr. PALMER. Yes, sir.

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the Senator please mention the States?

Mr. PALMER. In regard to pleuro-pneumonia, I will say that I know of no State in which pleuro-pneumonia is now prevalent west of the Mississippi River, but there is a disease——

Mr. PADDOCK. The Senator from New Jersey asked if there was any disease west of here.

Mr. PALMER. You mean west of Washington?

Mr. McPHERSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. PALMER. I should have to draw the line. I saw the other day that it had broken out in Cincinnati. There was a telegraphic report to that effect. A short time ago I saw that it had broken out in the western part of New York, but I can not speak authoritatively.

Mr. McPHERSON. Those two statements, I believe, have been contradicted, and I think the investigation of the Department will show that there was really no foundation for them.

Mr. VEST. I ask the Secretary to read a dispatch which I send to the desk, as to the Cincinnati statement, in connection with that identical report. It is good authority.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the dispatch will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

PIQUA, OHIO, March 29, 1888.

Dr. D. E. SALMON, Washington:

If pleuro-pneumonia exists in Cincinnati it is unknown to me.

J. S. BUTLER, State Veterinarian.

Mr. McPHERSON. Now, Mr. President, a single word more. As I understand, when the act of 1887 was passed, which conferred certain powers upon the Commissioner of Agriculture, subject, however, to the concurrence of the States themselves acting with the Commissioner of Agriculture, pleuro-pneumonia, and even the foot-and-mouth disease, so called, existed in a considerable number of the Western States in localities. In short, it had assumed a form that was decidedly dangerous for its spread throughout the whole country.

When we consider the transit of cattle over this country to different distributing points—for instance, the city of Chicago, is a great distributing point of cattle for all the country west of the Mississippi River as well as all east of it; when we consider the large feeding establishments scattered all over the West, distillery-fed cattle, in which the form of food or character of food is such perhaps as to aid in the spread of disease of this kind, and when we consider that within the brief period of time which has elapsed not a particle of pleuro-pneumonia is said to exist to-day, and there is no claim that it does exist in any of the Western States, it seems to me as though it would be well to continue a system which has produced such good results.

The Bureau of Agriculture has succeeded, I think, in expending during the past year only about one-half of the appropriation of money made. About $200,000, all told, is the sum that has been expended in stamping out this disease all over the country. It is true pleuro-pneumonia——

Mr. PALMER. I dislike to interrupt the Senator from New Jersey, but I thought he got up to ask a question.

Mr. McPHERSON. I do not mean to interfere with the Senator's speech. I supposed he had yielded the floor.

Mr. PALMER. I did not intend to interrupt the Senator offensively, but I shall never get through if I allow speeches to be interpolated every fifteen or twenty minutes.

Mr. McPHERSON. I understood the Senator to have yielded the floor, and I rose and asked him a question, taking the floor.

Mr. PALMER. The Senator was so entertaining that it is with difficulty I remember his question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan is entitled to the floor.

Mr. PALMER. The question was whether pleuro-pneumonia or any other communicable disease existed west of this point. Am I correct?

Mr. McPHERSON. My question was intended more to apply to the Western States. When I speak of the Western States I refer to the States as far east as Ohio, the great cattle-producing States of the West.

Mr. PALMER. This bill goes even further than that. It proposes to take hold of all communicable diseases. There is a new disease, mal de coit, which has broken out among horses, which bids fair to ravage the droves of the West, and which now is rioting in Iowa and in Wyoming.

Mr. McPHERSON. Is there any reason existing why the Bureau of Animal Industry should not take cognizance of that disease as well as any other? Is there any limit in the law?

Mr. PALMER. They are to take charge of all communicable and contagious diseases among animals. That is the object of the bill.

Mr. McPHERSON. But does not the present Bureau of Animal Industry possess all the power with regard to that disease that it would have in respect to pleuro-pneumonia?

Mr. PALMER. The present Bureau of Animal Industry have little power in the act establishing it except to investigate. All the power that has made it effective at all the last year has been through a clause in an appropriation act which I read. If the Senator was in the Chamber he could have heard it. I will look that up and read it to the Senator for his benefit.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PALMER. Certainly.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask whether it is not a fact that under existing law all the power of this bureau has over these tremendous diseases, which are multiplying in number and extent everywhere, is by virtue of the sufferance of the State itself, and that the Department has been enabled to accomplish what it has done simply by humiliating itself and beseeching the State authorities and paying all the bills; and that its efficiency depends only upon the courtesy of the State and the fact that the national money pays for everything?

Mr. PALMER. Not only that, but I have no doubt that the Department is doing many unconstitutional things. According to Commissioner Colman's report there are only six States that have passed appropriate legislation to co-operate. Thirteen States have passed statutes, but they are not of sufficient character to authorize proper cooperation, and thirty-one governors of States have assented to the Department taking action.

But there was a question asked some time ago in regard to the stamping out of the disease in Chicago. I ask the Secretary to read the newspaper clipping which I send to the desk. It is from Professor Law, than whom no man stands higher in the veterinary science in my opinion. He is thoroughly indorsed by the Bureau of Animal Industry and by all the cattle-men of the country.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read, as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Professor James Law, the distinguished veterinarian of Cornell University, was last year called to assist the Department of Agriculture in stamping out pleuro-pneumonia at Chicago. The success which has followed these efforts are well known. Some of the true inwardness of the attempts which have been made to weaken the laws in relation to this matter have received our attention in previous issues. Professor Law writes in reply to our questions as to the advantages of the proposed Miller-Carey bill over existing legislation:

The present laws governing the Bureau of Animal Industry are wofully inadequate to the eradication of contagious animal diseases from the country, no matter what funds may be appropriated. This inadequacy is mainly due to the fact that no power is given to operate within the limits of the State, except where a State voluntarily confers this power on the employés of the bureau and constitute them State officers. On this fundamental weakness, it seems to me, the Miller-Carey bill would have little effect, even if the Commissioner of Agriculture was chairman.

Our recent success with lung-plague in Chicago was entirely due to the admirable State law, and could never have been achieved had not the power of the State been freely accorded to sustain the officers of the Federal Government and render the Federal money effective. When Senators and Representatives can rise to the statesmanship that will consider an insidious and invisible disease germ as a constant threat at the entire nation, a threat which no State has any right to maintain at the expense of hurt or peril to another State—when they are ready to control this within the States by the power of the General Government, as it now controls the poisons of alcohol and tobacco, then we may hope for a statute which will be incomparably better than the Miller-Carey or any other bill yet presented to Congress.

Until that time arrives, Pennsylvania, with her great Philadelphia cattle market, situated midway between Baltimore and New York and supplying both, can deny the existence of lung-plague, exclude Federal inspection or any sufficient Federal inquisition which would test the sanitary condition of her herds, and continue to spread disease North and South. It is true that Federal authorities may quarantine the entire State, but while this might be respected by railroad companies it would not prevent the driving of cattle across the State line.—Farm and Home, Springfield, Mass., February 11, 1888.

Mr. GEORGE. I hope the Senator from Michigan will indulge me in a statement of not over half a minute.

Mr. PALMER. I will yield any amount of time, Mr. President.

Mr. GEORGE. The paper read at the desk indorses the Miller-Carey bill as the only efficient means of stamping out this disease. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the Miller-Carey bill has been abandoned in all its essential features, and that now the proposition before the Senate is confined, as I understand it, simply to the regulation of interstate and foreign commerce in these animals.

Mr. PALMER. That is as I understand it.

Mr. GEORGE. That is as I understand it; whilst the Miller-Carey bill gave the power to go into every house, every neighborhood, every cattle-field, whether the cattle were destined for transportation or not, and operated there.

Mr. PALMER. It was open to that objection, I will concede, but I think the Senator will see in reading this substitute that it is free from that objection.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator allow me to call attention, however, to one point, and that is that until, by extraordinary effort on the part of the Commissioner of Agriculture in securing favorable legislation from the State of Illinois, which had opposed the efforts of the Department previously to extirpate the disease at Chicago—until, I say, by the extraordinary effort made by the Commissioner of Agriculture in person and through his influences to secure State legislation in the direction of the extirpation of the disease, all his efforts were thwarted, and the result was only accomplished by the aid of the legislation of the State? All the powers contained in the Miller-Carey bill were actually brought to bear for the extirpation of the disease, and they were unable to do it at all, and the United States paid the bills.

Mr. CULLOM. If the Senator——

Mr. PALMER. In a moment. What we are now trying to bring about is to meet the difficulty of applying remedial measures at remote points from the Bureau of Animal Industry in Washington. That is what I am trying to make plain to the Senate. Now I will hear the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. CULLOM. I simply wanted to say that I think there is an effort made here possibly to magnify the difficulty that existed between the State authorities of Illinois and the national authorities. There was a little friction, as I stated, in the first instance, but when an act was passed (by whatever influence it is not necessary here to say), that changed the situation so far as Illinois was concerned, and there was no difficulty between the national authorities and the State authorities afterwards.

Mr. GEORGE. They are in happy accord now?

Mr. CULLOM. They are in accord now as I stated. I desire to say further that while the United States did pay a pretty large sum of money for the work that was done there, and for the destruction of animals, yet the State of Illinois paid also all that it had subject to the control of the executive authorities at the time.

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to ask the Senator from Illinois if the whole proceeding was not under the direction and control of the Bureau of Animal Industry, and if the State did not co-operate with and supplement the work of the bureau?

Mr. CULLOM. After the act of the State Legislature, which has been referred to, was passed, I think probably it is true that the national authorities took charge practically of the subject, although it was in accord with the State authorities.

Mr. GEORGE. The State authorities co-operated, did they not?

Mr. CULLOM. The United States co-operated with the State authorities in what was done.

Mr. PADDOCK. But still, whatever was done was under the control and direction of the Bureau of Animal Industry.

Mr. CULLOM. I am not prepared to say whether that was technically true or not. I am inclined to think that the power was exercised by the State authorities and the national authorities at the same time to some extent.

Mr. PADDOCK. I think the testimony before the committee——

Mr. CULLOM. I have not read that.

Mr. PADDOCK. Will bear me out in the statement that the whole matter was carried out by the direction and control of the Bureau of Animal Industry, with the assent and co-operation and help of the local authorities.

Mr. PALMER. In stating what I believe to be the facts I did not charge any blame on the Commissioner of Agriculture or the Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry. I merely stated the incidents to show how difficult it was to work in accord a thousand miles apart. I could read ad infinitum sixty or seventy pages showing where the friction was continual and continuous and aggravated. Not only that, but it was very expensive to the United States. I wish to submit a letter from Dr. Law, who is regarded very highly by the Agricultural Department.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter will be read.

Mr. PALMER. I will state that Dr. Salmon, to whom the letter is addressed, is at the head of the Bureau of Animal Industry.

The Secretary read as follows:

JUNE 18, 1887.

DEAR SIR: I have to-day received the copies of instructions and the blanks F, G, and K. I opine that they are meant for our information and for such adoption as will not seriously interfere with the method of work already in operation in Cook County, Illinois.

It would entail great loss of time on the part of our inspectors to require them to report daily all the work done. When at work 10 miles from the office it is not always possible to visit or even to communicate with the office without great loss of time. So with Mr. Watt, the chief of our disinfectors. His time is wanted from morning to night in supervising the work, and any regular absences would entail much slackness in the disinfection.

The provisions in section 7 will be entirely unnecessary after July 1. At that date the infected district here will be quarantined by proclamation, and individual quarantines will only be required for herds outside such district. We will also have advanced so far that the registration of cattle will be kept up mainly by the tagging of the fresh animals admitted. At present we not only tag but give a quarantine paper with each fresh animal admitted; as we have no quarantine blanks issued by the bureau, and as the necessity for such blanks will about entirely end with this month, it seems unnecessary to provide and issue such notices in the short interval now remaining. We aim to do away with herd quarantines by substituting district quarantines, indefinite as to duration. The release, when that shall come, will be necessarily a release of the district, and by proclamation.

Section 9, referring to appraisement, will not apply here, as our appraisers are State officials appointed by the governor.

Section 10, if carried out in Cook County, would hamper our work in no small degree, as the United States is only charged the difference between the proceeds of the slaughter and the value as appraised. It is evident that it is impossible to send you vouchers for such balance, and a quitclaim signed by the owner, before the animal was slaughtered. Even the necessity for a report of appraisement to the chief of the bureau for his approval before the slaughter would often be impracticable. A cow escapes in a suspected or infected place, and can only be sent to the abattoir; there she is appraised and should at once be slaughtered. Must she be kept until authority is obtained from Washington?

Disease is found in a herd where it is a source of great danger to other herds; must this herd be preserved until its appraisal and slaughter are sanctioned from Washington? In the case of cattle being condemned, the owners refuse to feed or care for them; can they not be slaughtered until every step has been approved at Washington? The objections are so numerous that I can not suppose you mean us to apply this rule to Cook County. The success of our work depends very directly on its promptitude, and any unnecessary delay in slaughtering is fatal to a speedy triumph. I need not say that the appraisers at work here are men far above any shadow of suspicion. If you desire it, I shall fill in form F, and make regular returns, but they will necessarily be somewhat imperfect reports, for reasons referred to above.

Respectfully,

JAMES LAW.

Dr. D. E. SALMON.

P. S.—A fairly full report could be easily furnished, if that will serve the end.

Mr. PALMER. The Commissioner said—I think it was in his speech at Kansas City—that everything now is proceeding satisfactorily. I send to the desk to be read a letter from West Somers, in Westchester County, New York. I do not believe that these facts have come to the knowledge of the Commissioner, and it is well that he should know them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read, as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

WEST SOMERS, N. Y., March 21, 1888.

DEAR SIR: I see by the papers you are preparing a report as to pleuro-pneumonia. Will you please examine the inclosed clippings, which, will give you some information as to how the business is managed here? Of course, our farmers are vitally interested in stamping out the disease; but when it breaks out twice on the same farm in a few months, as it has done on Brady's, and the Government pays him a good price for over 400 cattle which his son buys of the Government at a small price, and he continues to buy and sell cattle in large numbers, and drive them on the highways, whilst farmers are refused permits to use the highways along or through their farms, there is good reason to suspect favoritism, if nothing worse.

The officers appointed here are not such men as you would employ for your private business, and the general sentiment is that they are not doing any good, but much harm. Perhaps you will remember meeting me in the House Library last January 8, by the courtesy of Mr. STAHLNECKER.

If you wish further information in this matter I will cheerfully furnish it.

Respectfully yours,

M. E. FROST.

Hon. THOMAS W. PALMER,
Chairman Senate Agricultural Committee.

Mr. PALMER. I send to the desk one of the clippings from a Westchester County paper I suppose; Mr. Frost has not given me the names of the papers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the article.

The Secretary read as follows:

BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY—THE INSTITUTION FOR USING UP THE SURPLUS IN THE UNITED STATES TREASURY.

The question of what shall be done with the surplus in the United States Treasury, which has so long perplexed our statesmen and worried the politicians, seems to be about settled. The manner in which the revenue is being absorbed in the upper part of our county, if generally adopted throughout the States—and one can see no reason why it might not be—would deplete the United States Treasury of its annual excess of a hundred millions or more.

The modus operandi by which the surplus is sized is very simple, and within the understanding of the plainest farmer or dairyman.

A farm is overstocked with old and dry cows, too old and toothless to be fatted or too broken down by the process of forced milk production to be resuscitated at even a slight loss, and the whole herd, with an occasional exception, having no market value. An animal valueless for milk production, but developing fine capabilities for spreading pleuro-pneumonia, is sought for and readily obtained and thoroughly circulated through the herd. Sometimes the herd greatly increased after the process of inoculation has been properly attended to.

Generally the price of the increase of stock is about $10 or $15 apiece, and an occasional good beast is purchased to mix in the lot, and by this way there is a plan by which this seeming needless outlay may be turned to good account. By the time the necessary stock is laid in the seed animal is about dead.

A Government official is notified, and he of course pronounces it pleuro-pneumonia of the worst and most contagious character. Every animal that has been exposed is seized, and, as expected, the whole herd has been exposed, new recruits and all. Government appraisers are ordered to the diseased district. They are met at the station with the team, supplied with the proper amount of corn whisky or applejack, and after being feasted and whiskied until their judgment has been raised to the proper standard they are taken to the barn. Each beast looks as large and fine as a show steer.

They finally conclude, after looking the herd over, that $40 apiece would be a fair valuation, and the Government does the butchering. The diseased ones are buried and the healthy ones—well, what is the Government to do with their carcasses? Why, sell them to the first man that will take them, at his own price; and that man, whoever he may be, can repurchase of the Government for, say, $10, what the Government has just paid $40 for. Their carcasses can be disposed of in the city for fair market rates, on an average, perhaps, of $30, making a clear profit of $20 on a carcass, allowing the beast to be worth the appraised value of $40.

Having a few of the better grade of cattle in the herd makes things look a little better. Those that are too poor and thin for market are all condemned as diseased, and buried, or perhaps sold as prison or aqueduct beef.

Gentle reader, calculate, for you can, how long it will take the Government to run through, say, $100,000,000 in purchasing $10 cows at $40 per head, and as many as can be offered; or, selling carcasses of beef worth $30, and which cost $40, at $10 apiece.

From present appearances it is quite evident that should this contagion spread over this country (and it seems likely to), it will make a red-hot fight—a sort of pull-doctor pull-devil affair—and it will take a better guesser than the head of the Weather Bureau to tell whether the Government will stamp out the disease or the disease stamp out the Government.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I would like to ask the Senator if he knows——

Mr. PALMER. There is another clipping which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan has other matter which he wishes to have read.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I wished to ask if the Senator knew anything of the character of the man who wrote the article or where it comes from, or if it is simply a slander without authority.

Mr. PALMER. I do not pretend to vouch for the truthfulness of the articles, but they are such articles as would subject any paper publishing them to prosecution for libel. The one that will be read in a short time will convince the Senator, I think, that there must be some ground to induce a man or a paper to publish any such charges or implications.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Will the Senator state what paper the article came from?

Mr. PALMER. I said I could not state. The articles were sent to me by Mr. Frost. I suppose they are clippings from newspapers, but he neglected to indicate the names of the papers.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Then you do not know, even in point of fact, that they ever appeared in a newspaper?

Mr. PALMER. Oh, they were in a newspaper evidently, because they bear the foot-prints of newspaper typography. Mr. Frost is a reputable man and a man of substance. He renders himself liable by sending these clippings for use. There was no restriction put upon them. But if the Senator wants some real veritable articles from accredited papers, I can give him enough to occupy the attention of the Senate from now until to-morrow night.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I should be very happy to have some of that character, because when this very question was before the Committee on Agriculture I asked whether the complaints made in this matter were complaints about the law or complaints of its administration, and the statement was distinctly made by gentlemen who were conducting this matter that they were complaints of the law, and there was no complaint whatever of the administration of the law as it stood at present—that is, as to the personal management of it. I should be glad to hear anything on the other side, as that has been disclaimed up to this time.

Mr. PALMER. I think the Senator from Arkansas must have misunderstood the case, because the only bills that we have had before the committee have been bills providing for a commission, and that very fact would indicate that the administration was faulty. That is the vital point.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I am not mistaken, for I asked the question myself of the first witnesses produced on the stand. I asked them to explain this question to the committee, as I was anxious to know to what extent the complaint went, whether the allegation was that the administration of the law as it stood at present was defective or whether it was on account of the inefficiency of the law. I asked them whether it was an inefficient administration of the Bureau of Agriculture at present or whether they proposed to remedy some defects in the law, and the statement was distinctly made that there might be defects in the law. The management under the law as it stood at present was complimented so far as I heard before the committee all the time; and I never heard a charge of this kind until this moment. This would charge the Government officers with not only gross negligence, but with absolute dishonesty and corruption.

Mr. PALMER. I think it is open to that insinuation.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I do not think it is open to any other construction. It is as plain as can be.

Mr. PALMER. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. It struck me as being a little singular. When the gentlemen who propose to pass this bill came before the committee with the declaration that there was no complaint against the administration of the law, it is rather singular that they bolster up their case here with charges made which would partake of that nature.

Mr. PALMER. I will say to the Senator from Arkansas that these clippings have come to me since the meeting of the committee or since the examination or the hearing that we had; but if he will notice what I read from the statement of the live-stock board of Illinois he will remember that the same statement was made before the committee, that the management at Chicago was atrocious, that Dr. Trumbower was drunk half the time.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. That may be all true, but the chairman of the committee knows perfectly well that witnesses were present before the committee who proposed to testify from their personal knowledge about the management of the Government officers at Chicago, and it was those men who said that there was no complaint about the administration of the law as it stood at present. There were some charges that Dr. Trumbower or some other official there was drunk, but I never understood that it was alleged that every man connected with this business had been entirely reputable and efficient and competent. However, the statement was certainly distinctly made in my presence in the committee that the general management of this business had been fairly competent and efficient.

I have not a doubt in the world that clippings can be taken from newspapers issued all over this country that would blacken the character of any man who ever lived. We have seen that in many instances. No human being was ever so pure as to escape calumny. I believe even the Son of God himself was pursued to death by vile slanderers, and I suppose it can be done with any human being who lives to-day. I think certainly when charges of this sort are made, which affect not only the official character but the personal integrity and standing of men, we ought to know something of the authors of the communications which are read in the Senate, and we should certainly know whence they come.

Mr. PALMER. I will try and not have the other clippings open to that objection. I will give the names of the papers. To refresh the Senator's memory I will ask the Secretary to read from the red cross line on page 34 of the statements before the committee what Judge Wilson said.

The Secretary read as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. Give us the area.

Mr. WILSON. About 6 miles square.

The CHAIRMAN. None were discovered outside of that district in Illinois?

Mr. WILSON. No. Dr. Trumbower was the chief inspector of the Bureau of Animal Industry at Chicago, and I will state this for Dr. Trumbower, that he was well qualified, but he was an inebriate and a dishonest man. He is not fit to have charge of a responsible position; and when Dr. Salmon notified our board—I was not a member of the board when this took place—that he was intending to put Dr. Trumbower at the head of the bureau in Chicago, they told him that he was an inebriate, dishonest, and that he had been convicted of dishonest practices while treating pleuro-pneumonia in Missouri, and that he was not a man to put in charge of the bureau at Chicago.

Dr. Salmon said that he was a man of eminent qualifications; that he knew no man in whose judgment he could place as much reliance; that he had given him every assurance that he would do right, and that if he failed he should be removed.

Senator PADDOCK. Was he a skillful expert?

Mr. WILSON. Yes, he was.

Mr. PALMER. Here is an extract from the Philadelphia Record that I should like to have read.

The Secretary read as follows:

[The Record, Philadelphia, Saturday, April 21, 1888.]

DISGUSTED WITH THE COW-DOCTORS.

Farmers of Westchester County, New York, are turning at last upon the scores of cow-doctors who, in the usual free-handed way, have dominated their district for months past. "About one hundred indignant stock-raisers," the report says, "met at Mount Kisco last Monday, and, unappeased by the persuasive presence of the leader of the veterinary band, who sought to placate the assemblage, they passed resolutions denouncing the work of the Washington 'Bureau of Animal Industry' as 'highly injurious,' and 'demanding relief.'"

The speakers recounted their experience with some of the "deputy inspectors;" one critic declared that the average of these officials "could not tell a cow from a goat," and another charged that "they are by profession bar-tenders, dry-goods clerks, and tavern-keepers." It is an interesting and suggestive contest, and the sympathy of people familiar with the management of the nation's "contagion" business must necessarily be with the oppressed agriculturists.

Mr. PALMER. Here is another extract from a reputable paper vouched for by the tag, which I ask to have read.

The Secretary read as follows:

[Standard-Union, Brooklyn, N. Y., February 27, 1888.]

PLEURO-PNEUMONIA AND POLITICS—FEELING ON LONG ISLAND THAT FARMERS' INTERESTS ARE BEING SACRIFICED TO A DEMOCRATIC RING—PLAIN TALK ON THE QUESTION.

William Post, of East Williston, who recently had some trouble as to the transfer of his cattle, it is understood, is now perfectly satisfied with the arrangements made with Professor Law, of the Bureau of Animal Industry. He has been supplied with permits, which he fills out and forwards to the central office. Under the new arrangements he is required to save the lungs with the tag of the animal slaughtered, the lungs to be inspected twice a week by Inspector Ryder, who will report if any disease is found.

There is quite a breeze in Queens County at the high-handed manner in which some of the deputy cattle inspectors exercise authority claimed to be delegated to them by the National Government. In several places threats have been made that the deputies would be warned off the premises, but they have gone ahead regardless of threats, and in some sections have about completed their work.

It is stated that these deputy inspectors have been illegally appointed, and the work that they are doing, if any such work be required, should be done by the sheriff of the county and the town constables. Some of the cattle owners have already retained counsel to look after their interests. Most, if not all, of the deputy inspectors who have been appointed on Long Island are Cleveland and Belmont men, naturally.

As naturally the Hill wing of the Democratic party view with disgust the presence of such a band of politicians taking public money for the service of the Administration, largely to the consequent detriment of Hill's chances to secure the State delegation. The friends of the governor, however, look with great satisfaction upon the fact that the inspectors are not likely to do much effective electioneering among the farmers, so enraged are they against some of the more vexatious features of the law for the extermination of pleuro-pneumonia and its enforcement.

There can be no denying the fact that there is big politics in this pleuro-pneumonia business. At the meeting held at Jamaica a short time ago, Professor Law told the farmers that $500,000 had been appropriated by the Government to stamp out the disease, and when that appropriation was exhausted another would be forthcoming. He also told the farmers that the disease was carried from infected stables to healthy ones in the clothes of men.

Accepting this theory as correct, cattle-owners are inclined to shut out the army of inspectors, lest they, having constant employment among the diseased animals, may leave the germ of the disease where it never existed. Last week fifteen cows were taken from the infected stable of Mr. Schaurr, at Clarenceville, and driven to a slaughter-house in Brooklyn. The farmers say that Professor Law could do nothing better to spread the disease than this.

The Glen Cove Gazette, in speaking of the disease, has this to say: "It will increase. Pleuro-pneumonia is likely to be on the increase on Long Island, and keep increasing at the rate of 40 miles an hour until after the Presidential election. Politics having got into cows, it is a chance if there is so much as a heifer left in Queens or Suffolk Counties by November next.

Mr. PALMER. I could keep the Secretary reading until to-morrow night, but I will content myself with reading just one more extract at the request of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE], who hears indistinctly from the desk. This is an extract from the Advertiser, of Flemington, N. J., of March 30, 1888:

The New York papers are full of articles about pleuro-pneumonia in this and other counties of New Jersey. The health officials of Jersey City are complaining that the meat of some of the diseased cattle is sold in that city. Some time ago it was generally said that diseased meat of that kind had been shipped from White House, in this county, and that it was in such a condition that the railroad officials were afraid to handle it for fear of being poisoned. Any one who would sell diseased meat knowingly would, if not too cowardly, commit murder. One of the board of health of Jersey City said to a New York Herald reporter:

"Now just look at it. Here is a single official who can condemn a herd of cows worth $10 or $12 apiece and pay the owner $25 or $30, or even more, at his sweet will. That cattle owners would gladly buy up dry and broken down cows for the purpose of having them condemned goes without saying. They would not be human if they were not willing to pay a royal commission to pliant officials.

"When the cattle are condemned they must be slaughtered in the presence of an inspector. This official examines each animal after it is killed. If the animal is diseased it is sent to a fat-rendering establishment and rendered. If it is not diseased the inspector permits the owner to sell the carcass to a butcher, although it has already been paid for.

"We don't propose to permit meat that has been condemned while alive to be sold in Jersey City. If the cows are not diseased, then don't condemn them; if they are, don't attempt to sell diseased meat to the public. That is our position in a nutshell. The State of New Jersey is so jealous on this subject that its laws provide that when diseased animals are slaughtered the meat and hides shall be flayed and buried. If burial is impracticable the material shall be burned or rendered by the usual process.

"The Bureau of Animal Industry claims, I believe, that it has to condemn healthy animals because they have been in close contact with diseased ones. Inspectors do not want to take the risk of having any cows in a diseased herd live lest they may develop the disease later on and spread it anew. This may all be very well, but the board of health here will not permit the sale of meat from a cow that has been once condemned. We think that a live man is more valuable than a dead cow. It may be a wrong view to take, but it is the result of our humble meditation on the subject."

I merely read these extracts to show that instead of everything being lovely in this matter there is a great deal of complaint throughout the country. I suppose that I have in my possession over one hundred clippings, some of them short and some of them long. Some of the charges are by implication, some direct, and some are very atrocious; and if necessary, if any Senators wish to hear any more in that line, I can give them to-morrow.

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. PALMER. Certainly.

Mr. McPHERSON. I know something about the efforts of the Agricultural Bureau to stamp out pleuro-pneumonia in Jersey City, admitting, as I do, that pleuro-pneumonia existed in milk-stables in and about the city and in the country surrounding Jersey City quite recently. The Commissioner of Agriculture was advised of the fact that the disease was spreading considerably, and most radical efforts have been made to stamp it out, and I think the Department has nearly succeeded.

I should like to ask the Senator from Michigan if he had a board of four commissioners, as he would have under the provisions of his bill, what better the four commissioners could do than the Commissioner of Agriculture with his corps of men is now doing? To illustrate——

Mr. PALMER. May I answer the Senator now?

Mr. McPHERSON. In a moment. If, for instance, you find in a herd of twenty cattle only one or two animals absolutely diseased, it is the practice, I understand, of those having charge and authority in such matters to take those cattle, where evidences of disease are apparent, to slaughter them, send them to the rendering-tanks, and bury them or burn them; that is, to do something to absolutely obliterate the disease where the disease apparently exists; but as to other animals that have been simply exposed to the disease without any evidence that it exists, whatever it is, the practice is, if the veterinary surgeons declare it to be safe, wise, and proper, to allow those animals to be slaughtered for other purposes—for instance, for consumption by the people. Certainly in the case of an animal which gave no evidence of disease it would not be necessary or proper, or wise, perhaps to destroy that animal, burn up the carcass, etc.

That has been the practice. These cattle are appraised by competent inspectors. Some of them, perhaps, are very poor, and in many cases really unfit for beef, so far as the condition of the animal is concerned, but not by reason of disease. However, whatever is received for it, for that purpose or for any purpose, is credited to the General Government. Certainly neither the Commissioner of Agriculture nor any Department of this Government having charge of this matter could do better than is now being done. The animals are appraised at their value, and we suppose in every case at their full value, because that would be the natural consequence of any machinery of this kind. Whatever the animal brings is credited to the Government, and if there is any loss the Government sustains it.

But in stamping out this disease all over the country, the Department is shown to have been very economical, and really no disease exists now in any of the Western States. The execution of the law has been most efficient as well as economical. I can see no good reason for attempting to change a system which has brought about such good results. If complaint is made that the administration of the law has not been what it ought to be, then I can readily see why the Senator should propose a new administration—a board of commissioners, if you please; but as it is to-day, the Commissioner of Agriculture having full control of this matter, being himself, you might say, a dictator, he can act upon his own judgment; and that judgment has been very wise and very prompt in all of these matters.

The evidence of it lies in the fact that the disease has been absolutely stamped out everywhere, and to-day it scarcely exists in this country, except, perhaps, in the city of New York and on Long Island, and in Westchester County, New York, and in some parts of New Jersey contiguous to New York City some trace of the disease is yet existing; but the Agricultural Department are bending every energy and have a strong force of men to-day engaged in this good work, and we hope in the immediate future to have it to record that no disease exists even there. That accomplished, certainly there is no occasion for taking this great work out of the hands of an efficient power that has done so well and so economically as the present Commissioner of Agriculture.

Mr. PALMER. Did the Senator ask me a question?

Mr. McPHERSON. No disease existed anywhere except in a few localities, and there they are engaged in stamping it out.

Mr. PALMER. Did the Senator ask me a question? I thought he rose to ask me a question.

Mr. McPHERSON. I asked the Senator several questions, or rather I asked one question several times.

Mr. PALMER. Which would he like to have me answer?

Mr. McPHERSON. I want to know the necessity for changing a policy which has proved to be of the very best possible advantage to the country, and instead of the Senator answering it personally, he reads newspaper articles.

Mr. PALMER. No, I have not commenced to answer the Senator yet.

Mr. McPHERSON. The Senator has given some dissertations on the question by some country gentlemen.

Mr. PALMER. I have not had an opportunity to answer the Senator yet. He asks me why we should change; why we should prefer a commission to a single dictator. Well, Mr. President, I have often found two heads better than one and four hands better than two. I think the way to manage a great difficulty of this kind is by having, not one dictator, who has a hundred other duties to attend to, but four men specially designated for the work and who will be responsible for that work to the country.

Here Mr. Seth, secretary of the live-stock sanitary board of Maryland, says that "we are able only to pick the fruit as its ripens;" we are merely holding it in check. All these measures have been merely tentative and preventive, and we can not tell in how short a time or when it may break forth with greater virulence than ever. It is a hydra-headed disease.

I do not know but that pleuro-pneumonia was what the hydra was conceived from, for it started in the marshes around Argos; and the way to treat pleuro-pneumonia is the way they treated hydra there, because every time they cut off one head two heads sprang out. They went to work and seared and burned and disinfected, and that is the way Hercules got his reputation. Now, what I contend is that the Bureau of Animal Industry, with a single head at Washington, is not equal to the work, and that it never can be. You want intelligent men; you want practical men at the great centers where the cattle are. What would we suppose of a man who attempted to garner wheat in Dakota with an office in Washington? Where these agents of the Government, this board, should be, would be at the great centers where cattle are.

You read the report of the Illinois live-stock board and you will find it was six months before they began to get that epidemic in Chicago under restraint, and I have no doubt it caused a loss of millions of dollars to the cattle trade throughout the country. What is the fact now? Every animal that goes to Great Britain is diminished in value $10, merely on account of the stigma fastened upon our country by the prevalence or at least by the existence of this disease in certain localities. We have tried four years with the Bureau of Animal Industry, and my opinion is that there are more cases known in the United States to-day than there were four years ago. I think that there are over one hundred thousand now ready tagged, and they are picking them up all the time. Have I answered the Senator?

Mr. MCPHERSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. PALMER. That is the reason why I should prefer four commissioners to one, because these men could be sent to the different centers; and it is nothing derogatory to the Commissioner of Agriculture to say that he is not Briarean-armed and can not reach all over this country and touch every steer or cow on the plains or in the different meat centers.

Now, in regard to quarantines. I am told that these quarantines are all illegal, and they are very unpopular. For instance, down in Virginia a steer is taken with pleuro-pneumonia at Norfolk. Immediately the whole of Virginia is put under quarantine. I think it was for a year that not a single animal was permitted to be taken from Virginia across the Mississippi River, merely on account of one animal being diseased at Norfolk. I am told these quarantines would not stand in law, but no man who has cattle to sell is going to try to test the constitutionality of these acts by running a lot of animals up to the State line and then stopping.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Without a good pasture.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. J. H. Sanders, of the Breeders' Gazette, a man who has no interest at all in cattle, but who knows generally, and is probably the best informed of any man in the United States, in a statement before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, says:

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee: Mr. Smith has made pretty much the speech I should have made if I spoke before him. I hope the members of the committee will give this question careful consideration. The most terrible evil the cattle industry of this country has felt the last two years is the vexatious state of things that has grown up on account of this particular disease. Give us some sort of strong remedy that will enable us to get rid of these quarantines and of the disease. We shall never be rid of the State quarantines unless Congress does give us a strong national law that will afford us protection. Quarantines grow fashionable, and they will grow up on every small pretext, and they are very embarrassing.

If I made a speech of an hour about the insidious nature of this state of affairs, and how it operates, and how it is affecting our foreign commerce, and how it is affecting our cattle interests generally, I should only repeat what you gentlemen have all heard, I have no doubt. The main thing is, I ask you in the name of the cattle interest of this country and of the agricultural industry, that you address yourselves earnestly to this question. Do not look on it as a light matter. It is a serious business, involves many interests, and deserves careful consideration.

Whether the bill framed by this delegation is best or not is for you to say. If you can not give us this bill, give increased powers to the Bureau of Animal Industry, so that the disease, which is the root of the matter, can be caught hold of at once and trampled out.

The CHAIRMAN. Let me ask you one question, Mr. Sanders, in regard to these quarantines by different States. Do you suppose or know that the existence of pleuro-pneumonia is made a pretext in any case for the establishment of State quarantines?

Mr. SANDERS. I think there is a great deal of human nature about men, and I think that people are very apt to draw conclusions that promote their interests. I think that the ruling powers in Territories and States are very much inclined to believe in danger when they find that believing in danger is likely to act protectively to them. I do not say that any man is sensibly influenced by that, but I think all men are influenced more or less by those considerations.

This was in regard to a bill a little more radical than the one now before the Senate. It had only three commissioners. We have now four provided for, with the Commissioner of Agriculture as chairman ex officio in the present bill. Here is a practical man, Mr. Bowman, of Saltville, Va., who says in his statement before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

I will say a word with reference particularly to my own experience in this matter as a breeder and shipper of cattle. I am extensively engaged in breeding short-horn cattle, and a large portion of our trade has been selling bulls to the States and Territories west of the Mississippi River. In 1886 our trade west of the Mississippi River amounted to about $20,000. In 1887 we were not able to sell a single animal west of the Mississippi River, by reason of the quarantines against us. The day before I left home I got an order from the general freight agent of the Norfolk and Western Railroad, inclosing a letter from the Missouri Pacific Railroad Company, declining to take any shipments of cattle from the State of Virginia to points in the State of Kansas, without full notice to the shipper that they would be subject to a quarantine of ninety days at the Kansas State line.

The point I wanted to make is this: that if we were enabled in 1886 to sell $20,000 worth of cattle west of the Mississippi River, why should we now be subject to these quarantines when $500,000 has been at the disposal of the Bureau of Animal Industry during the last year, and they did not have a dollar before that, and especially when it is said by the officers of the Animal Industry Bureau, and the chief himself, that there is not a case of pleuro-pneumonia in the State of Virginia to-day? I do not believe there has been a case in Virginia for several years, though it is stated that a few cases existed in the county of Fairfax, just across the river, and in the city of Norfolk, over 300 miles from my place. Still I am prevented by reason of those cases, if they did exist, from shipping into any of these States that quarantine against us.

I could read in extenso on that subject, but I think that is sufficient. This subject of quarantine, I think, is fully as destructive of values as the disease itself and probably amounts to many millions. When I give figures I like to be exact, and therefore I will not say how many millions.

Mr. Colman, the Commissioner of Agriculture, sent a letter to Senators BLACKBURN and BECK. I said at that time that I would make a little analysis of it at some future time. He says that "the present bureau was established secondarily to suppress disease." That is news probably to all of us. He was not Commissioner of Agriculture in 1884 and perhaps does not know that this same committee of the united cattle interests of the country now urging this bill for their protection drew the act creating that bureau and urged its passage. Their primary, overwhelming object in that bill then was, as it is now, to stamp out diseases of live-stock.

The Commissioner says his "rules providing for co-operation have been accepted by the governors of twenty-seven States and seven Territories." His next sentence shows that legislation empowering co-operation exists in but thirteen, while in only six is it such as the United States law requires; and right there is one of the big points in favor of a commission. I believe that the first duty of the commissioners, and, if the commission is not created, of the Commissioner of Agriculture, is to give attention to seeing that the different States pass laws of co-operation, and all they want is to be invited to do it, and it seems to me that the Department of Agriculture is in fault in this respect that it has not solicited co-operation and gotten it, as it could have done if it had followed up the solicitation with any energy.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Will the Senator allow me to ask a question?

Mr. PALMER. Certainly.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Will the Senator explain how that duty can be any more efficiently performed by a board of commissioners than by the present or any other Commissioner of Agriculture alone?

Mr. PALMER. To me as a business man it is very clear, and I think it can be made to appear to the Senate very easily.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I should be glad to have it explained.

Mr. PALMER. Suppose that the Senator from Arkansas, myself, and two other parties were on that commission. We should assign to the Senator that particular duty to go to every State and get legislation. That would be a part of his duty which would be assigned to him by the commission. This undoubtedly could have been done; these acts of co-operation could have been brought about if there had been any one to have pushed the States towards the passage of them.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. The Senator certainly does not contemplate having some part of these commissioners turn lobbyists in any sense to get a measure of that sort through the State legislatures by personal solicitation?

Mr. PALMER. To that extent, certainly I should. You may call him lobbyist or you may call him commissioner or anything you please. I should go right to a State legislature and go before a committee. I should ask of the legislature an opportunity to address them. I should exercise every means in my power to induce them to pass co-operating laws.

Mr. BLAIR. I would state further to the Senator from Arkansas that he ought to remember that the testimony before the committee of which he is a member shows that it was only by playing that part that the Commissioner of Agriculture was able to secure the necessary legislation from the State of Illinois to enable him to accomplish the extirpation of the disease there. It is necessary to do that.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Such is my appreciation of the intelligence of the average American citizen that I believe if a communication should be addressed to the governor of a State calling his attention to the necessity for action on these matters, it would be just as well and speedily done as if some man bearing a commission, as a member of this special commission, should be sent to personally solicit members of the Legislature to pass laws that are absolutely necessary for the good of the country. That is the way I feel about it.

Mr. PALMER. I ask the Senator why has it not been done? They should have been invited, undoubtedly, or else the Commissioner of Agriculture has not done his duty.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Legislative bodies do not always perform their whole duty the first time it is mentioned. They are somewhat slow.

Mr. PALMER. We should have a Commissioner whose business it should be to see that there was co-operative legislation.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Legislatures do not always dispose of business with the promptness and rapidity with which it ought to be done. Some of us think that is so even in this body, which is supposed sometimes to be one of the highest legislative bodies in the world. We have been here for days and weeks wasting valuable time in the discussion of a measure that would, perhaps, have been much better relegated to the shades of oblivion long ago without taking up so much time with it. I mention this as an illustration that it is possible legislatures may sometimes go a little slowly in discharging duties that are absolutely clear and palpable.

Mr. BLAIR. This bill, however, the Senator will observe, obviates all that difficulty by giving the national Department power.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President——

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator from Michigan allow me to ask him a question on that point?

Mr. PALMER. Certainly, sir.

Mr. GEORGE. Is there any lack of State legislation in those States in which it is known that pleuro-pneumonia exists now?

Mr. PALMER. Yes, sir.

Mr. GEORGE. In what States?

Mr. PALMER. Pennsylvania, one of the big centers, around Philadelphia, one of the breeding spots for pleuro-pneumonia. As I say, there are only six States that have statutes such as the United States law requires for co-operation.

Mr. GEORGE. Is that the only State in which legislation is wanting where pleuro-pneumonia is known to exist?

Mr. PALMER. There are only six States, I would state to the Senator, where they have appropriate legislation for co-operation.

Mr. GEORGE. My point is this: Is there any State besides Pennsylvania in which pleuro-pneumonia is known to exist which has not co-operative legislation?

Mr. PALMER. I can not say as to that. I may run across that in my analysis of the Commissioner's letter; but I will say this, as my co-laborer on the committee [Mr. PADDOCK] says, there is sufficient legislation in but six States. The Commissioner claims to have stamped out pleuro-pneumonia in certain localities.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator allow me again? I have just been informed by the Commissioner that the State of Pennsylvania is in co-operation with the Department now on this subject.

Mr. PALMER. It has been since the last meeting of the committee, then.

Mr. GEORGE. I thought the Commissioner made the statement before the committee. I was not sure, but I thought he did, and I asked him a minute ago.

Mr. PALMER. I think the Senator is in error, but we will have time to look that over this evening. I will own up to-morrow if I find I am wrong.

Mr. GEORGE. At all events, as I understand it, the Senator only claims that the State of Pennsylvania, of all the States, has not the proper co-operative legislation now, so far as any State is known to have pleuro-pneumonia within its borders?

Mr. PALMER. No, sir; I make no such concession.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator then name any other State in which pleuro-pneumonia is known to exist?

Mr. PALMER. Or ever has existed.

Mr. GEORGE. I am talking about where it is known to exist, in which this co-operation is not extended to the national authorities.

Mr. PALMER. I would say to the Senator that "known to exist" is a very indefinite term. It may be existing there now; it may be suppressed and out of sight to-day, and may develop itself to-morrow. I can only put my finger on those States where it is known to be rioting, and those are Maryland, Pennsylvania, New York, and New Jersey.

Mr. GEORGE. Is it known to exist in any degree in any other State?

Mr. PALMER. I can not say positively. When the Senator asks me for exact knowledge on so peculiar a thing as pleuro-pneumonia——

Mr. GEORGE. I do not mean the Senator's personal knowledge, except as to this point: I ask him as to the information upon which he relies. Has he any information on which he relies that pleuro-pneumonia exists in any State which does not accord co-operation to the Agricultural Department, except the State of Pennsylvania?

Mr. PALMER. If the Senator wants me to give a categorical response to that I should say this——

Mr. GEORGE. That is exactly the kind of response I want.

Mr. PALMER. Pennsylvania is the only State where I am positively advised the disease exists, where I believe appropriate legislation has not been had and proper facilities offered to the agents of the Bureau of Animal Industry. Is that satisfactory?

Mr. GEORGE. Very.

Mr. EDMUNDS. With the consent of the Senator from Michigan, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan yield for that purpose?

Mr. PALMER. Yes, sir.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. EDMUNDS. At the suggestion of the Chair, who calls to my notice the fact that there are some messages from the President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1712) for the erection of a public building at Portsmouth, Ohio.

Mr. SHERMAN. No; there will be no objection to laying aside the unfinished business informally.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be informally laid aside to enable him to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1712) for the erection of a public building at Portsmouth, Ohio. Is there objection?

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The site and the building thereon, when completed according to plans and specifications to be previously made and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall not exceed the cost of $75,000; and for the purpose herein mentioned the sum of $75,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, to add after the word "appropriated," in line 17, the following proviso:

Provided, That the site on which the said building shall be erected shall be so selected as to leave an open space around the same of not less than 40 feet in width, including streets and alleys.

MINERAL LANDS AND MINING RESOURCES.

Mr. STEWART. I ask unanimous leave of the Senate for the consideration of Order of Business 596, being Senate bill 1888.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1888) to amend chapter 6, Title XXXII, of the Revised Statutes, relating to mineral lands and mining resources.

Mr. STEWART. It is only necessary to read the substitute reported by the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment reported by the Committee on Mines and Mining is to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill, and in lieu thereof to insert:

That section 2319 of the Revised Statutes be amended by adding thereto the following:

"But no person shall acquire, by location or possession, more than one mining claim on the same vein, nor shall any person relocate a claim which he has previously located."

SEC. 2. That section 2324 of the Revised Statutes be amended so as to read:

"SEC. 2324. The miners of each mining district may make regulations, not in conflict with the laws of the United States, or with the laws of the State or Territory in which the district is situated, governing the location, manner of recording amount of work necessary to hold possession of a mining claim, subject to the following requirements: The location must be distinctly marked on the ground so that its boundaries can be readily traced. All records of mining claims hereafter made shall contain the name or names of the locators, the date of the location, and such a description of the claim or claims located as will identify the claim. On each claim located after the 10th day of May, 1872, and until a certificate of entry has been issued therefor, not less than $100 worth of labor shall be performed or improvements made during each year. On all claims located prior to the 10th day of May, 1872, $10 worth of labor shall be performed or improvements made during each year for each 100 feet in length along the vein until a certificate of entry has been issued therefor; and for each 20 acres of placer claims, and for each subdivision thereof less than 20 acres, $100 worth of labor shall be performed or improvements made during each year until a certificate of entry shall be issued therefor. The period within which the annual work required to be done by this section shall commence at 12 o'clock meridian on the 2d day of January of each year: Provided, That upon claims located previous to the 1st day of November in any year the annual work shall be performed on such claim for that year prior to 12 o'clock meridian of the 2d day of January next succeeding. When the labor required by this section shall have been performed or the improvements made, an affidavit shall be filed with the officer authorized to record deeds in the county in which the mine is situated, particularly describing the labor performed and improvements made, and the value thereof, which affidavit shall be prima facie evidence of the facts therein stated. And upon a failure to comply with these conditions, the claim or mine upon which such failure occurred shall be open to relocation in the same manner as if no location of the same had ever been made: Provided, That the original locators, their heirs, assigns, or legal representatives, do not resume work upon the claim after such failure and before such location, and continue the same with reasonable diligence until the required amount of labor shall have been performed or improvements made. Upon the failure of any one of several co-owners to contribute his proportion of the expenditures required hereby, the co-owners who have performed the labor or made the improvement may, at the expiration of the year, give such delinquent co-owner personal notice in writing or notice by publication in the newspaper published nearest the claim, for at least once a week for ninety days, and if at the expiration of ninety days after such notice in writing or by publication, such delinquent shall fail or refuse to contribute his proportion of the expenditure required by this section, his interest in the claim shall become the property of his co-owners who have made the required expenditures, and such co-owner may relocate such individual interest in his own name. When a person or company has or may run a tunnel for the purposes of developing a lode, owned by said person or company, the money so expended in said tunnel shall be taken and considered as expended on said lode, and such person or company shall not be required to perform labor or make improvements on the surface of said lode in order to hold the same."

SEC. 3. That section 2325 of the Revised Statutes be amended by adding thereto the following:

"But no more than 3,000 feet in length along the vein of claims located prior to the 10th day of May, 1872, and not more than one claim located after said date shall be included in the same application for a patent, and not more than 160 acres of placer ground shall be included in the same application for a patent."

SEC. 4. That section 2335 of the Revised Statutes be amended so as to read:

"SEC. 2335. All affidavits required to be made under this chapter may be verified before any officer authorized to administer oaths in any State or Territory of the United States, or in the District of Columbia, and all testimony and proofs may be taken before any such officer, and, when duly certified by the officer taking the same, shall have the same force and effect as if taken before the register and receiver of the land-office. In cases of contests as to the mineral or agricultural character of land, thet estimony and proofs may be taken, under such regulations as the Commissioner of the General Land Office may prescribe."

SEC. 5. Amend section 2338 of the Revised Statutes so as to read:

"SEC. 2338. As a condition of sale, each patent shall reserve the right of way through or over any mining claim for roads, ditches, canals, cuts, and tunnels, for the purpose of working other mines: Provided, That any damages occasioned thereby shall be assessed and paid in the manner provided by the laws of the State or Territory in which such mine is situated for assessments and payments for land taken for public use under the right of eminent domain. And the rights and easements reserved under the provisions of this section in patents heretofore issued shall be regulated and made available as herein prescribed."

Mr. STEWART. I offer the amendments which I send to the desk, to make the time expire in the summer instead of in the winter, when snow may be on the ground.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 29 of the proposed new section 2, before the word "day," it is proposed to strike out "second" and insert "first;" and after the word "of," to strike out "January" and insert "August;" so as to read:

The period within which the annual work required to be done by this section shall commence at 12 o'clock meridian on the 1st day of August of each year.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEWART. In line 30 of the same section after the word "claims," I move to insert the word "already;" in line 31, to strike out "November" and insert "March;" in line 33, to strike out "second" and insert "first;" and in the same line, to strike out "January" and insert "August;" so as to read:

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEWART. In line 33, after the word "succeeding," I move to insert:

And the time for performing annual work on claims heretofore located is hereby extended to the 1st day of August, 1889, at 12 o'clock meridian.

Stricklett, late second lieutenant in Company A, Forty-fifth Kentucky Mounted Infantry Volunteers, in the war of 1861.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WATER-WORKS CRIB IN LAKE MICHIGAN.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask the Senate to take up Order of Business 801, being House bill 3333. There is no objection to it on the part of anybody, I think.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The title of the bill will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (H. R. 3333) to authorize the city of Chicago to erect a crib in Lake Michigan for water-works purposes.

Mr. BLAIR. I was about to suggest that we emphasize the action of the Senator from Kentucky in calling up a pension bill——

Mr. CULLOM. We can emphasize that after we pass this bill.

Mr. BLAIR. That we might emphasize that era in public affairs by an adjournment of the Senate. That is what I rose for. If the Senator from Illinois wants his bill to pass, I will withhold my proposed motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill the title of which has been read.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, in line 9, after the word "tunnel," to strike out:

Provided, That such piers or crib shall be furnished with a beacon light, which shall be lighted at all such seasons and hours as the light on the piers at the entrance of Chicago Harbor, and shall be satisfactory to the Secretary of the Treasury.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

The plan and location thereof to be subject to the approval of the Secretary of War: Provided, That said city shall furnish and maintain at its own expense such beacon lights or other signals on such piers or crib as the Light-House Board shall prescribe.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby given to the city of Chicago, county of Cook, State of Illinois, to extend a tunnel, or inlet pipes, into Lake Michigan, so far as may be deemed necessary to insure a supply of pure water, and to erect a pier or piers and crib in the navigable waters of said lake, for the making, preserving, and working of said aqueducts or pipes or tunnel; the plan and location thereof to be subject to the approval of the Secretary of War: Provided, That said city shall furnish and maintain at its own expense such beacon-lights or other signals on such piers or crib as the Light-House Board shall prescribe.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate insist on its amendment, and ask for a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. FRYE, Mr. CULLOM, and Mr. VEST were appointed.

LIGHT-HOUSE AT HOLLAND'S ISLAND BAR.

Mr. WILSON, of Maryland. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of Order of Business 1073, Senate bill 2398.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maryland asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of a bill the title of which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 2398) to provide for a light-house at Holland's Island Bar, near the entrance to Kedge's Straits, in the Chesapeake Bay, Maryland.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It appropriates $35,000 for the construction of a light-house at Holland's Island Bar, near the entrance to Kedge's Straits, in the Chesapeake Bay, Maryland.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, April 24, 1888.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

CUSTOM-HOUSE, BANGOR, ME.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, with inclosures, recommending an appropriation for repair and construction of abutments adjacent to the custom-house at Bangor, Me.; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

STEAM REVENUE VESSEL.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate from the superintendent of construction and the consulting engineer of the United States revenue-marine service of an additional appropriation for the construction of a steam-vessel for revenue duty on the Southern coast; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

JULIET G. HOWE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 300) for the relief of Mrs. Juliet G. Howe, with amendments of the House disagreed to by the Senate, and on which a conference was asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the House will insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

There was no objection.

Mr. MORRILL. In connection with this case, Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that on Friday evening last this Senate bill was substituted for the House bill.

The SPEAKER. In that case it became an amendment, of course, to the House bill, and the House bill as amended should have been communicated to the Senate in that form.

Mr. MORRILL. But both bills were communicated to the Senate as having been passed, as appears from the Senate proceedings—the House bill of the same title and the Senate bill just read, with an amendment by the House.

The SPEAKER. Still this bill had better go to a conference.

Mr. MORRILL. Yes, of course; but the House bill, I suppose, should be recalled from the Senate. It never passed the House, and after the Senate bill was passed the House bill should have been laid upon the table.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will give the number of the House bill the Chair will see that the error is corrected.

Mr. MORRILL. The House bill will be found in the proceedings of the Senate of yesterday, on page 3116. Its number is 8117.

MRS. ELVIRA L. JOHNSON.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 752) granting a pension to Mrs. Elvira L. Johnson, with House amendments disagreed to by the Senate, and on which a conference was asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the House will insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked by the Senate thereon.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 1483) for the registry of the barks Albert M, Condor, and Adelante; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. MILLS. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being demanded, the bill will be referred to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the joint resolution (S. R. 73) relating to the disposal of public lands in certain States; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. FISHER, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. SHIVELY, for five days, on account of important business.

To Mr. OUTHWAITE, for five days, on account of important business.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MILLS. I move to dispense with the morning hour for the call of committees.

Mr. HEARD. I ask the gentleman to yield to me to allow me to make a privileged report from the Committee on Elections.

Mr. MILLS. Very well; I yield for that purpose.

MISSOURI CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE.

Mr. HEARD, from the Committee on Elections, submitted a report in the contested-election case of Frank vs. Glover, from the Ninth Congressional district of Missouri; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. HEARD. I wish to give notice that I will call this case up for consideration on Saturday next, immediately after the reading of the Journal.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MILLS. I now renew the motion.

The question was taken; and the House proceeded to divide thereon——

Mr. MILLS. I withdraw the motion.

C.; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING, SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported back with amendments the bill (S. 1931) to increase the appropriation for the purchase of a site for a building for the post-office, courthouse, and other public offices in San Francisco, Cal.; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING, BAY CITY, MICH.

Mr. NEWTON. I am also instructed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to report back the bill (H. R. 7263) with amendments of the Senate, and move non-concurrence in the Senate amendments and ask a conference thereon. I would like to ask unanimous consent——

The SPEAKER. That can not be done in this hour, which is to be devoted exclusively to the reports from committees, no other business to be transacted. The gentleman can withdraw for the present the report, and make the request at some other time.

Mr. NEWTON. Then I withdraw it for the present.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9430) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to award a gold medal of the first class to Capt. Thomas Sampson, of New York City, for rescuing five boys from drowning.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to award to Capt. Thomas Sampson, of New York City, a gold medal of the first class, for bravery in rescuing, at the peril of his own life, five boys from drowning—three in June, 1854, and two in June, 1856.

The report from the Committee on Commerce (by Mr. DAVENPORT) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9430) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Treasury to award a gold medal of the first class to Captain Thomas Sampson, of New York City, for bravery in rescuing, at the peril of his own life, five boys from drowning—three in June, 1854, and two in June, 1856—beg leave to make the following report:

Special legislation is made necessary in this case by reason of the fact that Captain Sampson is unable to make a technical compliance with the general law on this subject, of June 20, 1874, which authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury, upon the presentation of satisfactory evidence, to award medals in cases where human life is saved from drowning at the risk of one's own life.

The sworn petitions of Captain Sampson, under date of October 18 and December 3, 1886, respectively, addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury, making application for the bestowal on him of a gold medal of the first class, are herein annexed as Exhibits A and B.

The General Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service, in a letter on this subject, addressed to Hon. S. S. Cox, a member of this House from the State of New York, and who introduced the bill herein referred to (which letter is also herein annexed as Exhibit C) gives the status of the case of Captain Sampson. In concluding his letter the General Superintendent says:

"There is no doubt in my own mind that Captain Sampson deserves a medal, but I do not see how it can be given him until he produces the evidence which the Secretary requires, and this, I understand, it is difficult, if not impossible, to get after so great a lapse of time."

In view of the facts set forth in the petition and General Superintendent Kimball's letter, and the signal recognition of his bravery by the Life-Saving Benevolent Association of the City of New York in awarding him for his heroism, in both instances, a gold medal, suitably inscribed, and recognizing the further fact that it is almost impossible for the petitioner, after the lapse of so long a time, to technically comply with the requirements of the law, by presenting the "evidence of eye-witnesses," and having full faith and confidence in the merit and justice of the petitioner's application for a like recognition of his bravery by the Federal Government in the bestowal of a gold medal of the first class, suitably inscribed, your committee report the bill back with the recommendation that the same become a law.

EXHIBIT A.

To Hon. DANIEL MANNING,
Secretary of Treasury:

The petition of the undersigned respectfully shows: That public act 135, approved by the President of the United States July 19, 1886, entitled the petitioner to claim the benefits conferred by act of Congress approved June 20, 1874.

Your petitioner respectfully shows that for the past twenty-four years he has been connected with the subtreasury in this city (New York), and for over ten years next preceding was connected with the police department of the city of New York.

Your petitioner further says, during the month of June, 1854, that he saved from death by drowning, in the upper bay of the city of New York, the lives of three boys, at the imminent risk of his own life; for this act he was presented by the "Life-Saving Benefit Benevolent Association of New York" a gold medal suitably inscribed, as shown by the records of the society, a certified copy of which is inclosed.

Your petitioner further shows that on or about June 2, 1856, he saved the lives of two boys in the Narrows, through which all vessels enter the port of New York. For this act a medal suitably inscribed was presented your petitioner August, 1856, as shown by the records of the New York Life-Saving Benevolent Association.

The saving of the lives of the boys referred to was regarded as acts of heroic daring and great peril.

In view of the facts presented, your petitioner respectfully asks that a medal of the first class be awarded him.

THOS. SAMPSON.

STATE OF NEW YORK, City and County of New York, ss:

THOS. SAMPSON.

Sworn to before me this 18th day of October, 1886.

EDWARD DONOHOE,
Notary Public (50), New York City and County.

EXHIBIT B.

NEW YORK, December 3, 1886.

SIR: The petition of the undersigned, a resident of the State, county, and city of New York, respectfully shows that under the provisions of the act of Congress approved July 19, 1886 (public act 135), being an act for the relief of Thomas Sampson, has the privilege of filing application for consideration, under the provisions of section 7 of the act of June 20, 1874, entitled "An act to provide for establishment of life-saving stations, etc."

Your petitioner respectfully shows that on or about the 15th day of June, 1854, while in bathing near Fort Hamilton, in the harbor of the city of New York, his attention was directed by the outcries of several persons on shore to the dangerous position of three boys, aged, respectively, nine, twelve, and thirteen years, who were in a rude skiff or raft of their own construction (which they were unable to control), fast drifting to sea and to their sure death. Your petitioner, unable to secure any help from the terrified persons who were witnessing the peril in which the lads were placed, at once struck out for the raft, succeeded in calming the fear and terror of the eldest of the boys, placed the youngest, a lad named Darling or Darlington, on his back, and landed him safely ashore. Your petitioner immediately started back to the fast-receding wreck, snatched the second boy, and, with an admonition to the eldest, almost frantic with terror for his own safety, left for the shore, where the second lad was safely landed. This boy was a brother of the first rescued. Your petitioner further represents that at this time the water was very rough and the bystanders cautioned him to beware of his own safety. Unheeding the fears of these persons, he swam out for the third boy, whom he found paralyzed with terror and clinging to the wreck in an almost helpless condition. This lad he took on his back, and when less than 40 feet from the wreck the lad's hold loosened and he was washed off. A shriek of terror arose from those on shore, when, notwithstanding my almost exhausted condition, I caught the boy again, and with a death-grip around my throat, dragging me down with him under water, I was enabled to break his hold, and with the aid of those on shore, who by this time had secured a rope, I was able to bring the boy, unconscious, and myself exhausted, to a place of safety. For this act a gold medal of the Life-Saving Benevolent Association of the City of New York, suitably inscribed, was presented me. The letter of the society accompanying the medal was sent to the Treasury Department about the 20th day of October last, with other papers. Your petitioner further says that some time during the month of June, 1856, while engaged in fishing in the upper harbor of New York, near Little Hell Gate, at that time a much dangerous channel, his attention was attracted by the cries of a number of people that two boys who were in bathing were in danger of drowning in that dangerous place. Without any thought of the consequences to his own safety, your petitioner jumped from a boat, swam for the place where the boys were, and, with the aid of an oar, with which he had provided himself, saved the lives of the two boys, one of whom had gone down for the third time and was given up for lost.

THOS. SAMPSON.

Hon. DANIEL MANNING,
Secretary of Treasury.

STATE OF NEW YORK, City and County of New York:

Thomas Sampson, of the State, county, and city of New York, being duly sworn, doth depose and say that he is the petitioner above named; that he has carefully read the statements contained therein, and swears they are true of his own knowledge.

Sworn to before me the 3d day of December, 1888.

MARVIN INGRAHAM,
Notary Public (No. 4), City, County, and State of New York.

[SEAL.]

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, owing to the failure of the Committee on Commerce to obtain its hearing on the days assigned, I crave permission upon this bill to make the remarks intended for other bills in reference to the life-saving system.

The general statute provides for medals to those who rescue human life, but as this is an exceptional case in which the evidence is not formulated according to the Treasury regulations I have proposed this measure in this House as an act of justice. The facts developed by the report show the heroism of my constituent, Captain Sampson. His is but one among the many honorable deeds which have distinguished this service. It is meet that Congress in a case where there is no doubt of the service rendered should decorate the hero with the same insignia which, under other circumstances, is within the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The unanimity with which this bill is taken up for passage is one of the signs that the service is strongly entrenched in the public mind and heart.

PUBLIC INTEREST IN THE SERVICE.

Besides, sir, the public interest in life-saving is evidenced by the number of bills on that subject which have been introduced during the present session. I have before me eight bills, for which my gifted and honorable friend from Michigan [Mr. TARSNEY], of the Committee on Commerce, has reported two substitutes.

The first class of bills, one of which was introduced by myself, authorizes the establishment of additional life-saving stations. The others look to a better provision for the pay and comfort of superintendents, keepers, and surfmen, and those who are rescued as well as a pension law for the families of keepers and crews whose lives are lost in the service.

The committee has wisely consulted with the excellent Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service, Mr. Kimball, and have reported such additional life-saving stations as our increased commerce and our new points of disaster warrant. These no doubt will receive the sanction of the House.

In making an increase of salary for those engaged in this perilous business the committee have limited their recommendation for the present to a small increase, which they say is a merited act of justice to those employed in saving life and property from shipwreck; and certainly no one who understands the usefulness of this service would be reluctant to increase the stimulus for the performance of the dangerous, trying, and arduous work of this class of Government employés.

Mr. Speaker, may I make this the occasion of arousing new and added interest in this great benefaction of our Government? In doing so may I be pardoned if I refer to its origin and results? The latter vindicate the former; for no department of our Government shows such precious compensation in valuable consequences to human life and property or such considerate care for the general welfare as the service with which for many years I have been associated in our legislation.

OBSERVATIONS ABROAD.

It may seem forward on my part to speak of observations which I have made abroad, and which almost directly, certainly indirectly, have influenced my regard for this service, but the occasion may justify the seeming egotism.

Emerson calls the desire to travel abroad a superstition. He thinks it springs from a want of self-culture; that "in our best and manly hours our best men stick fast where they are, like an axis of the earth, and that the wise man stays at home, and wherever he goes he is at home still." He must have had in his mind the celebrated French abbé who wrote a "book about his circumnavigation of the globe"—in his own chamber. Emerson makes one exception, and that is when a man travels for art, study, or benevolence; otherwise he regards traveling as a fool's paradise. The man who travels has a vagabond intellect. I am not sure but this transcendentalism is true, and that I am within some of its correlations, for I have enjoyed something of this paradise.

But, Mr. Speaker, I have not in traveling, whether in the Isle of Wight or near the classic Semplegades, been wholly unobservant of the qualities and conduct of this form of human benevolence, and out of this observation came my first little effort here as a commercial representative.

It happened once to me, in the fall of 1868, after my first election to Congress from New York, that I was on a steamer which came near shipwreck. A terrible hurricane had prevailed, and our vessel was amidst the dangerous Scilly Isles at Land's End. We had lost our way, owing to the inexactitude of the science of navigation. Instead of being in the English we were in the Irish Channel. No such storm has since appeared on the English coast. When I arrived at Southampton the English papers were full of it, and especially of the courageous conduct of the life-savers and coast-guards upon that coast. This led me to wonder why the United States, with a coast-line of 10,000 miles, washed by the vexed and vexing Atlantic, and with gulf and lake quite as tempestuous in certain seasons, had not organized some systematic plan under our Government for the rescue of human life and property stranded upon our coast.

ORIGIN OF THE PATROL.

When I returned to my seat I made examination into the matter. I endeavored to give my assistance to the member who then represented the New Jersey coast in his efforts to organize such a system for his own sea-bound State.

There had been a number of huts used for life-saving purposes upon that coast. They had fallen into decay; the appropriations had ceased, and there was no patrol system. In spite of great mortality on the coast from shipwreck, amounting to thousands where there are now hardly tens, there was general indifference to this humane object. Senator Stockton and Hon. Charles Haight, of the Monmouth district, were, however, making efforts for the resuscitation of these feeble endeavors to fight the elements.

When the sundry civil appropriation bill was in discussion in the House of Representatives on the 24th of February, 1871 (see Congressional Globe, volume 83, page 1607), my friend, Mr. Haight, moved his amendment. It failed. I saw it fall with keen regret. I renewed it with a less sum and for a fewer number of surfmen. All I asked was for six experienced surfmen to man the rickety boats at the few rotting stations upon the Jersey coast, commencing at Sandy Hook. The time of the service was limited from December 15 to March 15. The appropriation called for was not much. It was only $10,000. My appeal to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, now Senator DAWES, of Massachusetts—with whom I have had many pleasant relations from the beginning of our service here in 1857—was happily heeded. It was enforced in a picturesque way, by a book which I had found on a book-stall in London, which portrayed the life-boat, the rocket apparatus, and the line, and the car by which the imperiled passenger might reach the shore from the ship in safety.

Since the organization of this service I have had numerous inquiries, both at home and abroad, as to its history and modus operandi. Our encyclopedias, magazines, and newspapers have given much to the discussion on these themes.

And since, sir, there have been frequent requests made of me for the history of the beginnings of this work, I ask that there be printed my first remarks upon that appropriation, together with some extracts from a subsequent speech urging the enactment of the present law. These express better than I can express it at the present time the seminal idea which lies at the root of a tree which has spread its pleasant shadow since that time not only over our own but over other countries.

Certainly no object better illustrates the humanity of our constitutional order than the Life-Saving Service. No lawyer disputes that it comes within the provisions of the Constitution as to the regulation of commerce, and no man now disputes the benignity which tempers even the most stupendous storm, and rescues human life from its wildest commotions.

IMMENSE RESULTS SINCE 1871.

From a little spring of $10,000 in 1871, what immense results have followed! I would gladly share with Mr. Haight and Senator DAWES any honor which now, at this late day, may come to those who assisted this cause. My amendment was subject to a point of order, and the withdrawal of opposition by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts gave an impulse to the service which was not then dreamed of, and which has never yet been arrested. In fact, this is the beginning of the patrol system from which we date the true origin of the service.

But in 1878 it became necessary to reorganize the business with a view to greater accountability and efficiency. Owing to two terrific disasters on the Virginia coast a great interest was manifested. Pursuing the subject on the wave of this emotion, I introduced the present law, and endeavored to champion it, along with the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, Mr. Roberts, of Maryland.

Although the service is operated during only a portion of each year, and has been limited during a part of the time since 1871 to the most inhospitable portions of our coast, there have been momentous results beyond all our hope and prescience.

Little did I think, sir, when I offered the first amendment, to which I have referred, that we would have to-day distributed upon our sea, gulf, and lake coasts 218 stations, and that the skill, courage, and humanity of the gallant men who man them would make that service not only honorable and humane, but generally appreciated by our people and their representatives.

RESULTS LAST YEAR.

I have before me an abstract of the unpublished annual report of the General Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service for the year ending

June 30, 1887. I draw upon its statements to illustrate the divine beneficence of the service:

The establishment embraced at the close of the last fiscal year 218 stations, 166 on the Atlantic, 44 on the Lakes, 7 on the Pacific, and 1 at the Falls of the Ohio, Louisville, Ky.

The number of disasters to documented vessels, reported within the field of station operations during the year was 332. On board these vessels were 6,327 persons, of whom only 55 were lost. The number of shipwrecked persons who received succor at stations was 737, to whom 1,894 days relief in the aggregate was afforded. The value of the vessels involved in the disasters is estimated at $4,786,925, and that of their cargoes at $2,288,775, making the total value of property $7,075,700, of which $5,788,820 was saved, and $1,286,880 lost. The number of vessels totally lost was 72.

Besides the foregoing, there were during the year 135 casualties to smaller craft, such as sail-boats, row-boats, etc., on which there were 274 persons, only 3 of whom were lost. The property involved in these instances is estimated at $96,830, of which $92,915 was saved, and $3,915 lost. The result of all the disasters within the scope of the service is therefore as follows:

Total number of disasters	467
Total value of property involved	$7,172,530
Total value of property saved	$5,881,735
Total value of property lost	$1,290,795
Total number of persons involved	6,601
Total number of persons lost	58
Total number of shipwrecked persons succored at stations	737
Total number of days' succor afforded	1,894
Number of vessels totally lost	72

Even as a matter of cold business, the saving of property justifies amply the annual appropriations, which last year—including $50,000 for new stations—amounted to $961,800.

In addition to persons saved from vessels, there was 23 others rescued, who had fallen from wharves, piers, etc. These would have perished without the aid of the life-saving crews.

The Superintendent may well congratulate himself, and the brave men who serve with him, upon this annual result. In view of these facts, he may well felicitate the country that there was more work accomplished than in any previous year, except the one immediately preceding, 393 vessels having been floated off when stranded, repaired when damaged, piloted out of dangerous places, and assisted by the station crews. There were, besides, 210 instances where vessels running into danger of stranding were warned off by the signals of the patrols, most of them thus being probably saved from partial or total destruction.

With his usual vigilance, the Superintendent caused investigations to be made in every case of loss of life. These show that there was no failure in duty on the part of the station force engaged. The sacrifice during the year of eight members of life-saving crews at scenes of shipwreck expresses the devotion of the men in their efforts at rescue.

Of the 58 persons lost during the year, 22 perished by the capsizing of the ship's boat and the surf-boat together while the people were being transferred from one to the other; 21 by the breaking up of the vessel while efforts for rescue were in progress; 8 in attempting to land in their own boats; 1 died from exposure and 1 was washed overboard during operations for rescue; 1 was swept overboard and 2 were frozen to death before assistance could reach them; 1 was drowned while being helped into the rigging by his shipmates, and 1 was thrown from a capsized boat and drowned before help could arrive.

The report thus gives full and specific accounts of all the circumstances connected with the loss of these persons.

An unusual prevalence of snow-storms and of fogs made the operations of the service for the past year more than usually dangerous; nevertheless the crews succeeded in saving a much greater number of lives and a larger amount of property than ever before, in some instances performing feats of unparalleled daring. On one occasion a life-boat crew went 110 miles to a rescue. They brought ashore twenty-four persons—the crews of two wrecked vessels. On several occasions the station-men went on distances of from 10 to 20 miles and wrought similar deliverances.

In comparison with the involvement of the most sacred thing belonging to our nature—human life—the values of property which have been saved are of little consequence. But I have been in the habit, in my vigilance over this subject, to recall to the attention of the House from time to time the statistics of the service in a summary form, so as to show from the first little appropriation, to which I have referred, in 1871, the results to the close of the fiscal year.

Ah, if the eye could only read between the figures of these disasters and values and rescues of human life and property! Here they are in bold and frigid statistics. What a benignant and gracious cycle of sixteen years since the little appropriation was given!

FROM 1871 TO 1887.

Total number of disasters	3,852
Total value of vessels	$44,609,960
Total value of cargoes	$20,939,819
Total value of property involved	$65,549,779
Total value of property saved	$47,330,992
Total value of property lost	$18,218,787
Total number of persons involved	35,427
Total number of lives lost	544
Total number of persons succored	6,373
Total number of days' succor afforded	17,207

The loss of life includes 183 persons lost at the wrecks of the steamers Huron and Metropolis, and also 14 other persons, really not chargeable to the service, for reasons given in the report. This leaves the total number of lives lost during the sixteen years of the existence of the system only 347, out of 35,427 involved.

The saving of human life up to the present time doubtless exceeds thirty-six thousand. Is there a member of this House who, in looking at this splendid result, would be indifferent or laggard in the pursuit of his duty in assisting to give new energy, better pay, and greater honors to this service? Why, too, should not the suggestion which was made by the Women's National Relief Association be heeded, when it asks this session for an additional appropriation to give that comfort to those who are rescued for which the Association has been organized, and to place upon the pension-list the families of those who have lost father and husband in their conflict with storm and sea?

Again, Mr. Speaker, I draw from the unpublished report of the Superintendent, Mr. Kimball, two more paragraphs, in order to show the continuous advance in the equipment and increase of the service:

NEW STATIONS.

New stations were completed and put into commission during the year at North Scituate, Mass., and at Frankford, Pent Water, White River, Holland, South Haven, and Sturgeon Bay Canal on Lake Michigan. Two others, one at Cape Elizabeth, Maine, and one at Cape Lookout, North Carolina, have been completed, and will be put in commission during the coming winter. A new station at Jerry's Point, New Hampshire, is also approaching completion.

Four old stations have been replaced by new and improved stations, and four more are under contract for rebuilding, while extensive repairs have been put upon twenty-two others on different portions of the coast.

The General Superintendent recommends the establishment of stations at Wallis Sands, New Hampshire; Plum Island, Massachusetts; Lynnhaven Inlet, Virginia; Ashtabula, on Lake Erie, and Marquette, on Lake Superior.

These last are in the bill I presented, and are adopted in the substitute of the committee, so that the House now has before it in all its completeness the past efficiency, present condition, and future provision for this service. They have, too, the most weird and wonderful record which has ever been made connected with human and humane government. It is an epic more humane than that of Homer and more ennobling than that of Milton.

ROMANCE OF THE SERVICE.

These extraordinary expressions may not be considered too exaggerative or romantic when you consider the ever-varying disaster and the terrific conflict of the heroes of the deep against the wildest turbulence of the elements.

As the waves of the Red Sea, at God's own voice, rolled back to make a pathway for His chosen people, so, out of the very depths, man redeems his brother man, safe, joyful, and free!

Shortly after the La Amérique was stranded on the Jersey coast and its hundred lives were rescued by our gallant surfmen, the artist Bierstadt, whose pictures adorn each side of your chair, Mr. Speaker, endeavored to portray upon canvas the scene which I vainly endeavored to picture in my speech in 1878. He told me that it defied his art. The storm, the wind, the ice floes, the snow, the seething brine, the stranded vessel, the strange lights upon the ship, and the stranger Coston signals upon the shore, with the tumult of the waves and sky, and the shrieks of the imperiled—these made up a scene upon the wild sands of New Jersey for which there is no expression in the art of painter or poet.

The reports of the Superintendent furnish a class of literature which illustrate that "truth is indeed stranger than fiction." The pen of Walter Scott, Fenimore Cooper, or Victor Hugo, each one facile, graphic, and grand in its own peculiar grace on maritime scenes, would fall from a nerveless grasp in striving to depict the storm and shore and darkness—"wondrous strong"—which furnish the mise en scene of these wonderful rescues. It furnishes a stage for heroic conduct as an example to mankind, but amidst the alarm, confusion, catastrophe, and gloom, and the huge dark surges upon the shore, they constitute the acts of a tragedy whose significance is unknown to the ordinary forms of human struggle and expression and whose features of divine sublimity only a Greek of the mould of Æschylus could reproduce in all the magnitude of its superhuman destiny. War with its death-dealing artillery and portentous cloud, is tame compared with the courageous effort made by our gallant heroes. What are all the instrumentalities which have been called into use by the invention of man—the guns, the explosives, and the vessels of war—compared with that little howitzer that shoots the line which leads the despairing to the shore? The inspiring courage which handles the wreck ordnance, the line rocket, the life-saving projectile, the howitzer, and the surf-boat—these are not the enginery of death but of life! It is this intelligent intrepidity which makes such dumb instruments subservient to humanity, and with such a result that every year new appliances are added to inspire human courage for the same great object.

This service did not belong to the Navy Department, for the men trained in the Navy are deep-water sailors and seldom know the currents, shoals, and dangers of the coast. It is to the fishermen, the surfmen who patrol the coast by night in all weather, even in the wildest Walpurgis night which would appall the stoutest heart, that we owe the wonderful work which our statistics display. It is by these men, well drilled for the performance of their duty in their perilous avocation, that these dead statistics are made vital with energy and humanity.

INSTRUMENTALITIES.

Our service differs from the service which I observed abroad, for we have substituted for the rocket, the howitzer, and for the life-boat the light and portable surf-boat. The latter is fitted especially for the shelving beach, but it requires the greatest skill for its management. The plan of throwing a rope to a vessel in distress, the mortar and the ball which carries the line to the ship and makes its connection with the shore, the buoy known as the "breeches buoy," and the life-car for the expeditious removal of the passengers who are endangered, demonstrate the advancement in the United States upon this mechanical line of philanthropy. It is our pride, also, that our life-saving stations, though not models of architecture according to the esthetic mode, answer the purpose, and the comfort which follows the rescue has well been provided by the voluntary contributions from the Women's National Relief Association, of which Mrs. Chief-Justice Waite is the president.

PERSONAL INCIDENT.

May I not, therefore, take a pardonable pride in the establishment and progress of this system, which has no peer in the world for its effective work, and no paragon in the history of nations for its inspiration?

I sometimes think, Mr. Speaker, that I have had, through the mercy of God, more than my compensation for the little I have done in the promotion of this service. When struggling for life one year ago in this city, when the little will-power which was remaining was ready to succumb before the ravages of disease and the agony of pain, and when friends had almost given up hope of my surviving, I cast my eyes upon two pictures upon either side of my sick-bed. One is that of the life-boat going out through the storm to the rescue of a ship wrecked upon a rock-bound coast, while those on the shore, the relatives of the surfmen, stand speechless with anxiety as to the fate of the brave men who hazard all for the rescue. The other picture is that of the same life-boat coming in. It is laden with its precious freight. Amidst the howling of the storm, and the dark clouds around the beetling cliffs, the cry goes up from thankful hearts: "All safe! All well!"

In my poor, sick fancy I grasped the tiller of the life-boat; I clung to it with a tenacity that overcame the sinking heart and emaciated body. The good doctor, when I related to him the incident and the source which inspired me with a fresh hope and a new life, gave me smiling assurance that I might still survive, as a rescued man, to plead for the Life-Saving Service in many Congresses.

THE SEA.

Is there anything connected with our relations in this world surrounded with more sanctity, or to which we should give more thoughtful consideration, than the rescue of "those who go down to the sea in ships?"

Picture to yourself a fearful night upon the Northern lakes. The time is winter. The roar of the blast keeps a wild harmony with the waves of the sea.

> The storm dashes out with its wings,
> And over the sky, from south to north,
> In the strength of a mighty glee.

It is in such stormful emergencies that our stalwart surfmen trudge their weary, watchful patrol over shifting quick-sands and obscure paths to do their noblest work in wintry blasts, and when the crisis came to breast the breakers in which many of them have lost their own lives.

Ah! sir; there is a pathetic poetry belonging to the sea, which is all too sad for the ordinary prose of human composition.

The sea has been the theme of praise by many writers; their vivid descriptions forever remain in the memory. They have applauded its services as the great purveyor of the world's commodities for the diversity of food which it yields, and, most of all, for the "wonders of the Lord in the deep." But no pen has ever done justice to the grandeur of its aspect, even in calm, or to the might of its tempests in storm. It is said that it entertains the sun with vapors, the moon with obsequiousness, the stars also with a natural looking-glass, the sky with clouds, the air with temperateness, the soil with subtileness, the rivers with tides, the hills with moisture, and the valleys with fertility. It gives meditation to the mind, and the world to the world, all parts thereof to each part, by the art of arts—navigation.

Still, above all is that restless, overwhelming power, in the wild tumult of its wrath, when its crested waves make a compact with the clouds and the winds, the thunder and the thunderbolt, and sweep on in their dread alliance.

And yet, to sustain that art of navigation, there is another art, called into being by the genius of man, which dares contend against the wild, insatiable, and reckless Saturnalia of the sea.

Oliver Wendell Holmes compares the sea with the mountains, to the great disadvantage of the sea. He loves—as who does not—the mountains, where the least of things seem infinite; but the sea is to him a huge feline, licking your feet, purring at times pleasantly, but ready to crack your bones and eat you for all that, and then wipe the crimsoned foam from its jaws as if nothing had happened. The sea had for him a fascinating, treacherous intelligence, stretching out its shining length, and by and by lashing itself into rage, showing its white teeth, and ready to spring at the bars while howling the cry of its mad fury! That furious wild animal, the arts of man has caged and tamed!

Before the genius of man the wildest waves become calm. Parent and child, wife and husband, brother and sister and lover, who are tossed and stranded, are rescued from the washing and wasting element, which is subdued and enchained by human bravery. As Byron has sung, "Man has wantoned with its breakers, and that which was a terror becomes a pleasing fear." Our noble crews defying its billows, have laid their hands upon its mane and tamed it to their will.

NOBLER SERVICE THAN WAR.

Governments give medals for the taking of human life. We give medals, as in the pending case of Captain Sampson, for the saving of human life; but it was not without a hard struggle upon this floor that I obtained even a limited compensation for the families of those who died in the struggle to save others. This effort was partially successful in 1877, when some pecuniary and annual allowance to the relatives of the crew of seven heroes, who perished in striving to assist the United States steamer Huron on Lake Michigan. There are others similarly situated, to whose courage I then referred for their efforts to save life from the Italian bark Nuova Ottavia on the coast of North Carolina. Seven men perished in this attempt at rescue, and their widows and children cry aloud in their destitution for our help. Superintendent Kimball regards it as good for the service to bring both keepers and crews under the pension law. He says:

> These crews are composed of poor fishermen, who live scantily and find a main means of support in the slender pay they receive as surfmen. Grown old or disabled in the service, they sink into penury or dependence, and when they lose their lives, as in the signal disasters of the past year, in attempting to save others, or when they die in the course of nature, their death, after all their valuable and heroic service, leaves their families in poverty and want. It should be borne in mind that they are the very flower of their class, hardy and able seamen, dexterous and courageous, matchless in managing boats in heavy seas and in the perilous neighborhood of wrecks, and of such approved integrity, that the property of mariners and passengers and the cargoes of vessels saved by their efforts suffer no loss at their hands.
> Each year the record shows hundreds of lives and vast amounts of property saved by their exertions, and these exertions, laborious in themselves, are often made at the peril of their own existence. It is conceived, therefore, that the soldiers' right to pension exists in their case also, and that when age or infirmity has come upon them, or when they surrender life in the line of their duty, what they have done and suffered for others should be remembered to them and theirs by the nation. It is also recommended that the benefits of the pension laws be extended to such keepers and crews as may become disabled in the discharge of duty and to the widows and orphans of those who may perish in attempts at rescue.

Why, sir, should not this recommendation be accomplished? How much more ennobling is the system fostered by this service compared with the system by which whole hecatombs have been slaughtered in human warfare! "Ah," said DeQuincy, "what a vulgar thing does courage seem when we see nations buying and selling it at a shilling a day."

In the old days it was said that it was beautiful to die for one's country. Under the inspiration of martial music and other martial exercises patriotic men rush to the conflict and die. Nations vote pensions and decorations to the hero who first plants a flag on a parapet or rescues it from an enemy. How much nobler to decorate and pension the man who, seeing one of his own kind, though a stranger, in the struggle and despair of death, plunges into the very jaws of the unseen future amidst darkness and danger to reclaim his fellow-being from a watery grave.

LIFE BEFORE PROPERTY.

Let it not be forgotten, sir, that the orders of our Life-Saving Service are, first, to save life, and then property. Monte Cristo, with all his wealth of gems and gold, must give way to the weak woman and child; and if he had the jewels of Aladdin's cave they must wait the safety of the living before the salvation of gems, silver, gold, bonds, or any form of wealth.

OTHER AIDS.

This law but supplements other laws of a benevolent character for the safety of ships and the saving of lives. Our light-houses, coast surveys, revenue-marine service, and all voluntary aids are a part of that advancement which is warranted by the commerce clause of the Constitution. Our life-boats, light-signals, rafts, swimming-armor, buoys, guns, and fog-horns,—these are the instruments which invention has revealed for the salvation of life imperiled on the sea. The advancement of mechanical skill and chemical science has enabled us to talk through the telephone from one remote point to another; aye, even to telegraph from Washington to the remotest point on lake or gulf, amidst and above the roar of the storm and the surf to dictate the saving of human life, and even to give to every station its directions and warnings in most unambiguous tone and meaning.

We read of the wonderful light of Pharos, which is said to have beamed a hundred miles and stood fully 500 feet aloft. But electricity like a star glitters from afar, and develops a potential and magical illumination for the relief of the storm-tossed and despairing amidst the tempests of our earth.

When the fishermen of Nantucket, Fire Island, Barnegat, or Hatteras, Huron, and Michigan, or the surfmen upon the shores of Washington and Oregon, push through the mountain breakers into the furious flood to bring their human freight in safety to the shore, there is an epical splendor in the service, more faërie-like than that which Spenser sings of the enchanted diamond shield of Prince Arthur, or than that represented by the mythical maiden when she led the wise Ulysses over the blue Ægean to a harbor of safety by her magical scarf.

SUFFERING OF FRIENDS.

There is no mystery like that of human life. What links it so subtly to the human body which enshrines it, we do not know. Who can measure the goodness and grandeur of every act which tends to its salvation? What ties of kindred, and friendship, and love, are not embound in the golden rigol of life! Its extinguishment by sudden death—is it not the terror of the living? And its prevention—is it not the burden of our religious litanies?

There is some consolation, Mr. Speaker, in the loss of friends who die in their homes. They are surrounded by medical skill and comfort; we can smooth the suffering brow of their death-bed; we can kiss the pallid lips of our loved ones before they go hence forever; we may close the fading vision in calm resignation, and, looking up through tears, we may whisper, "God wills." Husband, wife, child, father, mother, sister, and brother, all find it poignant to part, even though the summons comes among sweet and pleasant associations. But think, sir, of the terrible ordeal of shipwreck, with no rescuer near! How blessed, therefore, for such dire emergencies are heroes who, with cheerful duty, or leaping beyond it by some divine instinct, defy the monarch Death, and his terrible myrmidons, fire, storm, and water, to snatch from his clutch the victims of his power!

Who can measure the wonderful grace of that government which not only attempts to rescue the victims and the stranded ships from the storm, but gives consolation to those who, as Jeremy Taylor well says, have not yet suffered shipwreck, but who amidst the dark night, an ill guide, and a boisterous sea, and broken cable, and hard rock, and a rough wind, may be dashed in pieces with the fortunes of a whole family, and they that shall weep loudest for the accident have not yet entered into the storm?

LIFE MORE PRECIOUS THAN LIBERTY.

We may construct upon our shore the image of Liberty holding up its torch to enlighten the world; we may allure the immigrant to our country by this lustrous imagery at the harbor of our great metropolis; but no such light, even though dazzling with its electric brilliancy, will attract the attention of the good men of our kind like the serene and blessed illumination that radiates from our life-saving statute and proclaims to all the world—to men of every condition, race, and nationality—that when overcome by the terrific disasters of the sea, they have at every perilous point upon our coast the heroic courage of men who are equipped and ready to leap into the surf, to launch their boats through its "league-long rollers," to breast the tempest in its angry howling, and to rescue those who are hanging upon the vast abyss and about to be swallowed by the angry waters.

It is said in the New Testament that a man will give his life for his friend. But these men, almost without pay, with a lion-hearted courage, far excelling that of the soldier under the impulse of patriotic devotion—are ready in the pursuit of their high duty to glorify our human nature by laying down their lives, if need be, for those—even those who are aliens and strangers.

DIVINE ASSOCIATIONS.

What glory has an aureole so golden as this? It is peerless, because it has the holiest associations. The master grace of St. Peter was courage. When he perceives the Saviour walk upon the boisterous sea, and hears the voice saying:

"Be of good cheer; it is I," he cries out.

"Lord, bid me come unto Thee!" and the Master says:

"Come." When his faith begins to fail, and his body to sink, he cries again.

"Lord, save me!"

Then Jesus stretches forth His hand, and he is saved. He finds in that returning faith, stability; as if the waters were petrified into a rock of everlasting safety.

If it were not almost sacrilegious, Mr. Speaker, I would say that this is the one example with which our life-saving heroism can be paralleled. I need not say to this House how much that example has done for mankind, and how beautiful, beyond all expression, is the life which He lived, and the death which He gave for the salvation of men.

May the God who has implanted in human nature the courage and will to save others, and with such a marvelous and divine example before us, give to the American Congress, which has never failed to aid these measures, that blessing which makes life a daily beauty, and death an eternal beatitude.

ORIGIN OF THE PATROL SYSTEM IN 1871.

Mr. COX. I move the following amendment:

"For pay of six experienced surfmen to man the boats at alternate life-saving stations upon the New Jersey coast, commencing at the first station from Sandy Hook, from December 15 to March 15, to be appointed by the keepers thereof, at $40 per month, $10,080."

Mr. DAWES. Is not that the same amendment?

Mr. COX. It only provides for half the service of the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey—for service in the winter season, from December to March, when storms extend along the coast of New Jersey. The gentleman from Massachusetts must know that there is no part of the coast of the United States, or any coast in fact in the world, so very treacherous as the coast from Sandy Hook to Cape May. It is owing to the unusual form of the coast and to the fact that the shore line is not in any sense the land line. Our surfmen are not always on duty in the winter season. And there is a necessity for additional service if we would save human life and property by this sort of service.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] very properly and kindly said that this was a humane as well as a useful institution, and he complimented my friend from New Jersey [Mr. Haight] for introducing it here. It is a part of the civilization of our time. From 1785, when the first life-boats were made in England, they have been considered as of the greatest utility. By one society alone in England ninety-two hundred and twenty-two human lives were saved by means of this life-boat service

I hold in my hand a book which illustrates, not only by picture but by the text, the amount of human life which has been saved by this service. By firing a shot from a mortar over a boat a line is made and a car is connected between the ship and the shore. On the Ayrshire coast, which is shown in the picture I hold in my hand, two hundred and one persons were saved at one time by these humane regulations. But, sir, the board of underwriters, the marine-insurance people, the wreckers themselves—all the kindly people, all the commercial people of the city of New York and of New Jersey, and other parts of our largely extended coast are interested in this most beneficial service of life-boats. We need them there, not merely to save life and property, but to save life and property at the worst time, namely, in the winter.

I hope, therefore, if the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. DAWES) objects to the larger service which my friend from New Jersey has asked for, he will not object to this semi-service. I hope he will consent to this moderate and just proposition, and allow this half service at alternate stations along the coast in the winter season. There may have been no report from the Treasury in favor of this, although I think there is a difference of opinion between the gentleman from New Jersey and my friend from Massachusetts as to that. The time has not come yet for a full report as to what has been the result of last year's legislation. But before we break down the whole system by a neglect of legislation this year, let us at least break it down only halfway, maintaining the service in the inclement winter season, and when it may be of great utility and will not involve any very great expense.

Mr. DAWES. I would not weigh a dollar with the life of a man exposed in a storm, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] knows that the opposition to this measure on the part of the committee does not arise in any desire to save money as against the perils of the sea. It is only because those who have charge of these appropriations believe that the best method of maintaining this service is that of paying for the occasion and the necessity when they arise. But I do not want to antagonize with my friends upon such questions as this. I therefore withdraw my opposition, and am willing to accept the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX].

Mr. COX. I am very much obliged to the gentleman from Massachusetts, and I beg to say that I did not by any means impute to him any lack of humanity.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. COX, it was agreed to.

ORGANIZATION OF THE BUREAU OF LIFE-SAVING.

The House having under consideration the life-saving bill, reported by Mr. Roberts, of Maryland, from the Committee on Commerce—

Mr. COX, of New York, said:

Mr. SPEAKER: The necessities of our condition on this star make the seas highways to man. Prompted as well by curiosity and adventure as by a desire to trade and live, man has ever braved the ocean. It has its wonders and utilities, and human skill and courage have not been wanting to reveal them. From the frailest craft of the isles of the southern seas to the grand steamers that breast the Northern Atlantic; from the rude sailors of antiquity, who steered by the stars, to those who use the compass, the quadrant, the dead reckoning, and the signal lights; from the time when our largest oceans were a waste known to but few, or when its supremacy was disputed by Carthage and Rome, to this later era when Maury has traced the streams themselves amid the seas for the benefit of commerce, and the goblin of steam has shortened voyages and matched the storm king—it has been a part of the science of our advancement to watch, with unwinking espionage, the phenomena of the waters that cover the face of the earth.

COMMERCE TRIUMPHANT.

For thousands of years ships have glided through liquid leagues, from horizon to horizon, harmed and unharmed, under sun and star. They have brought to us the wonders of the deep for poetry, art, science, and civilization. From Salamis to Trafalgar human passion has imitated the angry elements of the sea in war, and ensanguined the deep with the blood of nations, and every muse has chanted its heroes of the sea. Beneath the blue of the Mediterranean repose the bones of past greatness, whose relics are epics like an Odyssey, forever sung in the memories of men to the "swelling of the voiceful sea." It has been reserved to another art to transcribe for the eye these memories. Vernet, Van Beest, Vandevelde, Bradford, and a galaxy of artists have pictured every mood of the ocean, from the drifting, drifting of the endless main, or the auroral radiance rising above the billows to gild the world, to the wild tumult of the cyclone, when the deep boileth and maketh a path to shine after it. These princes of the palette have given to the canvas, sun, shade, cloud, sky, shore, sail, craft, and water; sailor, boat, wreck, and storm, in all their beauty, vigor, truth, and wildness, and in every form and color to gratify art and glorify nature.

Science has dived below the surface to analyze the foundations of the earth, and lay the measures thereof, to confound our human surmises and propitiate our fears. To the superficial eye, even the ocean is unparalleled as an exhibition of force and sublimity; but when mechanism measures its depth it becomes, in comparison with the solid earth, "but as the sweat of the wrestler's brow compared to his knitted body." Byron called it "deeply, darkly, beautifully blue;" but it was La Place who ascertained its depth before the plummet had sounded it or observation had obtained it for the Atlantic cable. The science of man has penetrated its deepest zones, down among the oölites of the northern sea, and the coral reefs of the southern, and multiplied to infinity the wonders of that day when the sea shall give up its countless dead.

OCEAN DANGERS.

Strange as it may seem, one of the weird attractions of the ocean is its danger. Property and life beyond human estimate have been swallowed up by its capacious, all-devouring hunger. Civilized nations, especially those which are maritime, have levied taxes and concerted plans to lessen these dreadful dangers. Our light-houses, coast surveys, buoys, signals, life-boats, and mortars—like quarantine, and rods against the thunderbolt—these are but a small portion of the precautions which have been taken to rescue property from its insatiate clutch and welcome the mariner with joyful beacon from headlands, before he furls his sail for home.

Humanity, more beautiful than Art—and more profound than Science—has bent over the tempestuous seas her grand ethereal bow, infolding its hues of promise, as an everlasting covenant with heaven!

THE ENGLISH SYSTEM.

The English National Life-Boat Association has saved, within fifty years since its establishment, some twenty-five thousand lives and fabulous values in property. Its coadjutors, the coast-guard and rocket-saving bureau, under the government board of trade, have increased these benefactions. This has been done almost entirely by voluntary contributions. Two millions of dollars have been spent in these efforts.

The English system is not very old. It is no older than I am; it was born the same year. But it has a harvest of humanity garnered by the endurance, pluck, and goodness of its men. It has voted thanks and honors, inscribed on vellum, for those who cared not for medals or money. In money it has given $20,000 per year in gratuities to the rescuers of life. Since its organization it has spent, up to 1876, $1,940,000, and given ninety-two gold medals and eight hundred and seventy-one silver medals. The lists are published annually. Besides, it has during that time paid $200,000 yearly for boats and apparatus, being the amount of its receipts from its invested bonds and donations.

Upon its medals is the picture of the royal patroness, the Queen, and the Biblical motto "Let not the deep swallow me," being the exclamation of a shipwrecked man as he is drawn into a life-boat by adventurous life-savers. These deeds, more golden than ever historic or epic pen recorded, are all done around the little sea-bound coast of Britain. Who shall complain that we spend the same sum per annum upon our 10,000 miles of sea and lake coast? What vicissitudes of weather meets our American mariner—from the tropical tornado to the tempestuous nor'easter; from the jagged fiords of Maine to the hidden shoals, rips, and ledges of Massachusetts and Rhode Island; from the menacing arm of Cape Cod to the insidious sand beaches, treacherous undercurrents, and exposed headlands and points, 600 miles southward to where Hatteras and Fear extend their dangers into the very main itself. Nor are these points of our vast coast the only ones prolific in ghastly disasters. My bill now pending proposes to rescue life upon the capricious gulf, the stormy lakes, and even upon the falsely named Pacific shore. Wherever our adventurous commerce goes, wherever Neptune disports with the elements to whelm the forces and agencies of man to master them, there men of our manliest mold will be found to combat him.

But, with all human precautions, how many are the disasters! Although in England but 1 per cent of the vessels is lost, and although our losses are less, yet the record is not what it should be.

REGULATIONS, NOT LEGISLATION, AS TO DETAILS.

The bill can not provide for all emergencies. Much must be left to its efficient execution. The complaints as to partisan preferences in certain localities can only be obviated by honest discharge of duty. The regulations provide for medical and other inspection, and the great body of the details, such as the mode of drill, kind of boats and lanterns, the use of telephone or telegraph, of horses, wagons, uniforms, life-preservers, buoyant rafts and breeches, buoys and rubber suits like Boyton's, and even dumb stations, as recommended in a letter to me from Captain Ollinger, as well as the selection of the men, can not be the subject of legislation. They belong to the "regulations," and are under control of the supervising agencies.

These the Secretary of the Treasury is already empowered by law to make. They are here in the volume before me. The life-boat stations, the life-saving stations, and houses of refuge each have a distinct unity. In the appointment of superintendent, inspector, and assistants, much care must be exercised, but the keepers and surfmen must undergo suitable examinations. They must be familiar with their locality and work. The duties of these officers is specially delineated by the regulations. Rules are given for the care of the apparatus. The first duty, before goods or property, is the preservation of life. Cargoes must have care, especially if dutiable. The resuscitation of those seemingly drowned is impressed with clear instructions. Patrolmen with their lights are organized, and in their duty they are held to a strict account. Guards against fraud and embezzlement of goods are imperative; and every precaution possible is to be used to identify and provide for the dead and the surviving. The rules are illustrated here on page 45, which show how the line from the rocket mortar should be faked on the ground; how it is to be shot, how secured, how the rope and the block are made fast to the mast, and how the hawser and the cylindrical iron car with its freight of six is hauled ashore. Not less rigorous is the direction for the self-bailing and self-righting life-boat. Those who saw the apparatus at the Centennial require no further elucidation of its use. Much depends upon the experience of the surfmen. They must dodge the seas or beach the boat, and much more depends on the character of the broken water and the shoring. Detailed instructions are given as to the rescue of the drowning, and the swimming against the outgoing tide or current. Signal flags, lights, and guns have their interesting chapter; and in all these matters drill is insisted upon with imperative command.

OTHER RESCUES IN THE HURON AND METROPOLIS STORMS.

Where the protection of the service is ample, such failures do not occur. In the same storm that wrecked the Huron the life-saving crews rescued eighteen persons, men and women, from the Russian bark Johanna Lang, on the New Jersey coast, and the crew of the schooner Maggie, on the Long Island coast; and in the storm which wrecked the Metropolis the crews of two vessels which were driven upon the New Jersey coast were taken ashore by the life-saving men. These were all the wrecks which occurred upon the coast in those storms. The columns of the New York papers of the 23d of February show what splendid work the life-saving crews did in the storm of Thursday night, the 21st of February.

In no instance within the past six years can failure to rescue imperiled seaman on stranded vessels be successfully attributed to the inefficiency of the Life-Saving Service. If any instance be cited as such I assert that proof to the contrary can be produced.

SUFFICIENCY OF FUNDS AND EFFICIENCY OF SERVICE.

The general answer to attacks on this point is, where there is sufficiency there is efficiency. On all other parts of the coast than North Carolina the Life-Saving Service has been a complete success. For years the public journals of the country, stimulated by the exploits of the crews of such wrecks as those of the Rusland, the Amerique, etc., have sounded its praises. Last year every illustrated newspaper in the country pictured the splendid work of these crews and could not say too much in their honor.

SHALL THE NAVY HAVE IT?

But it is said that "a practical man" should be placed in charge of the Life Saving Service. By this is meant a navy man or a seaman—one who may know Bowditch better than the Gulf Stream, and Norrie better than steam-engines.

The answer is that success is the criterion of administrative ability. We point to the extraordinary and admitted success of the Life-Saving Service on every coast where its system has been fairly tried. North Carolina is not to the purpose. Why not charge inefficiency because of disaster between Hatteras and Cape Fear, where there are no stations, as on the other parts of the North Carolina coast, where there are too few? Is a seaman for the head of an aquatic establishment necessary or preferable? Is not the Secretary of the Navy a civilian? Are not the heads of the life-saving institutions in Great Britain, from whence came the life-boat and the grand traditions of skill and prowess in life-saving, civilians?

The officer in charge of our Life-Saving Service has the assistance of "practical" men in the inspectors and assistant inspectors of the service, who are officers of the revenue marine, and are skilled coast navigators such as the Navy can not show. He has local superintendents who are old seamen and surfmen; besides the officers of the Ordnance Corps, whose services have always been available in relation to experiments in gunnery, with a view to getting shot-lines to vessels.

Sophistry may be expected on the subject of placing the Life-Saving Service in the able hands of naval officers who know the requirements of such a service, etc. The fact is that our naval officers are notoriously deficient in the very elements of the knowledge which is required to conduct the Life-Saving Service. For example, a primary requisite is knowledge of the coast and coast navigation. The wreck of the Huron, which was a new and good vessel, is a signal instance in point. In this disaster the cabin might have learned from the forecastle. This disaster tells far more against the Navy than it ever could be made to do against the Life-Saving Service. What sort of knowledge of the coast was shown by her being on that dangerous shore at such a time?

The revenue marine has frequently been employed in getting off Navy vessels. Ignorance of our coast or unskillfulness on the part of naval officers often causes them to get their ships aground. A number of our naval vessels have been lost within the last few years through this cause.

To transfer the Life-Saving Service to the Navy is to take it abruptly from the hands of those who have spent upon it years of toil and study and gained experience and knowledge which only time can bestow. It is to place it in the hands of amateurs—men who have no knowledge whatever of its nature and requirements, except what they have gained by reading or cursory observation during some chance visit to a life-saving station. This, to say the least, is a hazardous experiment.

At first thought there might seem to be a propriety in placing the Life-Saving Service in the Navy Department, both being aquatic; but here the analogy ends.

WHO ARE SURFMEN.

We do not want soldiers or sailors for the surf. We want surfmen who are mostly fishermen. Our fisheries are no less the nursery of coast navigation than the nurture of men. It is often the case that when our vessels order their boats lowered from the davits and sent ashore through a line of breakers by mere sailors the boats are swamped. There is as much difference between a seaman and a surfmen as between a seaman and a marine. What would young naval lieutenants know about our perilous coast, compared with the men who have gained experience from long residence there? An old surfman who writes to me that "much has been said about brave jack-tars making good surfmen, but put the captain of a canal-boat on board of a ship in mid-ocean in a heavy gale." He makes a picture of such a scene. When it is all icy so that the ablest seaman hesitates to go aloft, while the mate shouts out in thunder tones "Lay aloft there, you land-lubber, and furl that royal!" "Where, then," he asks, "would be that captain, albeit familiar with the raging canal?"

The trade of battling with breakers when mountain-high is hard to be learned, and is never learned to perfection. "There are men here," he writes, "who have launched their boats in the surf for the last forty years; they are learning something every day." Who will say that these men are not superior to any that can be produced from a man-of-war?

It may be all right for our honorable Speaker to appoint a gentleman from the interior, like my friend from Tennessee, on the Naval Committee, as chairman. He comes within the poetic description of Wordsworth:

"Though inland far we be
His soul has sight of that eternal sea,
Can in a moment travel thither,
And see the children sport upon the shore,
And hear the rolling waves, forevermore."

But this is as fanciful a picture as the use of blue-water sailors for coast and surf duties. He might manage a flat-boat, or perhaps could sail upon the open deep, as a navigator, and be able to tell me the difference between a sky-scraper and a scupper, or between a garboard-streak and a first futtock! But what could he do in the league-long rollers thundering on the shore or how clamber up their watery Alps and go through or over them in safety, as a sea-bird touches the bounding billow? Experientia docet.

THE INEFFABLE GLORY OF LIFE-SAVING.

I have said, Mr. Speaker, that we have one beautiful statute, which has a sacred halo around it. It makes a sunshine in the shadow of our selfish, sectional, and patriotic codes and laws. It is that which preserves human life. It is not merely a sentimental humanity, but a real benefaction. Like the orange-tree, it bears fruit and flowers at the same time. No language can make more emphatic that which every member must feel in contemplating its inestimable beauty and beneficence. It is no exaggeration to say, in view of its object, that it gives us a glimpse, though dim, of the golden age. The world's heart clings to it, as if it were a memory of a past paradise, or the hope of paradise regained. The sea itself plays its mighty minstrelsy in its honor! No reward can adequately remunerate for the saving of precious human life. Men, as Bacon has said, fear death as children fear to go into the dark, and in proportion as they fear so is their appreciation of its sacredness. There are a thousand deaths in the apprehension of losing life. It is the one terrible enemy. We are used to contemplating it, even in the most loving surroundings of home, as the arch foe of mankind. The silent closing of the flower around the insect is, however, none the less a death agony, even in the gardens of home.

Life is precious, because its loss can not be repaired. Jeremy Taylor has told us that while our senses are double, there is but one death—but only once to be acted, and that in an instant, and upon that instant, all eternity depends. Other losses may be recompensed by gains, but loss by death, never! No one is so lordly or powerful as to stay this irreparable loss. Every day puts us in peril. While we think, we die. What care and esteem can equal the eternal weight of human life? Can any legislation be too ample or adequate for its protection?

To you, inland legislators, far and aloof from the stormful perils of the sea, who sit happily in the blooming circle of household loveliness, it is the one hard lot of life for you to see the silver chord loosed and the golden bowl broken. None but the stoic, and he perhaps is a myth, can sing that sweetest of canticles, Nunc dimittis. But there is a peculiar terror connected with death by shipwreck amidst the leap and clash, the boiling and battling of the tempestuous coast. Who can picture the poignancy of such death, in the company of those whose piercing shrieks and prayers typify the worst agonies of human despair?

Who can picture the joy, beyond all joys, when in such despair and amidst the double darkness, the cry of "Life-boat!" rises above the surge of winds and waters? How buoyantly it floats, now under the weight of water, yet insubmergible, and now leaping above on the feathery plume of the wild wave.

The life-boat! oh! the life-boat!
We all have known so long;
A refuge for the feeble,
The glory of the strong!

It is a part of the progress of our civilization that death shall be wherever possible robbed of its sting, and even the watery grave of its victory; nay, the very stone removed from the sepulcher as if by angel hands, in the revivification of those only not drowned. Who can describe the terror of the long-absent, sacrificed at the threshold of home, in sight of the dear native shore? Think of Margaret Fuller Ossoli! Think of her at Rome, the lover of Italy; the synonym of all that was first fair, first good, first beautiful! What a romance was her life! In Rome, more than a Roman; in Italy more than an Italian; in America, the emblem of our best thought; an intellect and taste, no parallel except herself. What infinite and strange forebodings she had before she sailed on the good ship Elizabeth. Out of the flowers, sun, and sympathy of Italy, along with her noble husband and beloved child, she sailed, all-unwillingly, to her home, to her mother, sisters, friends. Passing through pestilence, and at last past the terrible trials of our coast, in midsummer, she lost by wreck her sweet and benignant hold on our mundane life. She went down with her husband and child in sight of home. Her written thoughts perished with her manuscripts, in sight of her home. There was no life-boat to save. She sat in her death-robes twelve hours in sight of the Fire Island sands on the Long Island beach. Ossoli and her child and her noble self, they perished as one. She went from the storms of time and sea to the infinite One, who opened the doorway to the white throne.

STORM PIRATES.

It is recorded in the volume which honors her life and describes her death that her manuscript history of Italy was pirated and destroyed by the wreckers. Similar imputations most unfounded were made upon the honest folk of the Carolina coast, but they were promptly refuted by Hon. R. B. Roosevelt, of New York, who was near the wreck, and denied by members here. It is many years since the wreckers thrived on our coasts. But it is within the memory of men present when the name "wrecker" was a synonym for the "storm pirate." Upon the Cornish and the Jersey coasts he preyed upon the dangers and calamities of the sea. Much has been done in England from time to time by her shipping acts to mitigate the barbarities, cruelties, and wrongs which have for so many ages added to the perils of the sea. The most terrible penalties have been enacted against despoiling the wreck and murdering the shipwrecked. It was the disgrace of the centuries. But, happy change! The world rolls on, the footfall of progress is audible; every form which the inventive mind can adopt is called in requisition by human governments to rescue life.

STORM WARRIORS.

It has always been a law among nations that salvage should be allowed for the rescue of property in ships. It was but the other day that an English court gave a large sum to the heroes of the sea who brought the floating obelisk of Egypt safely to port. Only a year ago the Life-Saving Service on the Jersey coast saved two millions of bullion for our Treasury. But it is of more recent date, and from a better spirit, that the savior of human life can not only be rewarded with a salary under Government, but by medals of honor and the laudation of the good. It was but the other day that I picked up a volume by a minister of the Gospel about the life-boat work on the Goodwin Sands. He pictures a familiar scene of a century ago. With the skill of an artist he surrounds a company of low-browed villains with the environment of darkness, wildness, and storm, on a cliff near the sea. They plot for the destruction of a vessel. It is the story of Nagg's Head over again. A white horse is led along the edge of the cliff; a lantern is tied upon him; the light sways with the movements of the animal, not unlike the masthead-light of a vessel rocked by the sea. A ship is making steadily for the land. The captain grows uneasy. He will put his vessel round. The lookout man reports a dim light ahead, "What kind? Whither away?" "Ay, ay, sir! 'tis a ship-light, for it is in motion." Yes, it must be a vessel standing on the same course with this. The captain will go on. There is a lull in the storm. A hoarse murmur is heard. It is the sound of the sea beating on the rocks. Lo, a white gleam upon the water. Breakers ahead! Down with the helm! Round her to! Too late! too late! Crash! A shudder from stem to stern; the shriek of voices in agony; the sweep of the seas over the vessel. Broken timbers, and cargo, and lifeless bodies lie along the beach. No! One living body is thrown among the rocks. Dead men tell no tales. Murder closes the tragedy.

Think! all these pirates of the tempest have given way to the storm warriors, the life-boat, the howitzer, the rocket's flash, the hope-signals of safety—the salvation of human life. Can there be a nobler object for human legislation?

Imagine a wreck upon our coast in January! A steamer of 3,000 tons burden is steaming through the rain, cold, and darkness. Unconsciously, she approaches land. She has a pilot on board, but there is an error in sounding. There is a southeast wind and a heavy sea. Her immense dusky hulk is shadowed against the night like a living monster. Her gloomy lights are shades. They glimmer as faint stars gleam through clouds. How can words paint the scene? If there be one artist whose genius alone could do it, it is Turner—he who has portrayed the tossing sea and its wild crests, the desperate passengers and reckless crew, the broken rudder and general menace of the wreck. Add to his genius the obscurity of a Rembrandt with his shadows unbroken in their blackness, save by little flashes of luster, and fill the dim object with the throbbing enginery of man, trying to mate the surging sea, and you have all that the eye can see of this unspeakable terror.

Hardly do we discern her hull, her smoke stack, her masts and yards projected in black against the gloom, when we hear the noise of her steam, the mighty clank and throb of her engines, mingling with the rustle of the rain, and the weltering shocks of the seas, as she rushes on with vast undulations,

"Crunching down the brine,
Like a blind god that feels his way with thunder."

On her deck are a few muffled figures; below, in the berths, are two hundred or more sleeping forms. Suddenly there is a tremendous shock! Every one on board is thrown down, and the sleepers below are dashed about pell-mell. Then, above the din, is a storm of screams. The ship is in a strong convulsion, pounding upon the sand! The engines stop, the bell is still ringing, the whistles are shrieking, but amidst and above the hissing of steam, the swash of the ocean, and the shouts of command, are the human yells of dismay.

What does all this mean? It means that the steamer is hard aground on a bar, plunging and writhing with an ominous straining, and cracking, through all her huge bulk, as if in the grip of some vast monster. Gradually she settles with slanting deck, over which, to and fro, in the darkness, run half-clad tottering figures.

The rain matters little, for around her, like a shoal of monsters, are the winding seas; and there, on her lee, a few hundred yards off, in the gloom, up-shaking and down-falling, pallidly, with ominous uproar, are the breakers. She is stranded on the Jersey shore! Well may there be horror and confusion, and dismay! Between her freight of souls and the land is that unstable wall of surf. The storm increases, and the heavy coils of water swirling round her, rise and lick off her oaken planking as with the tongues of hydras, and the great surges club the bottom with her hull until they break her kelson! This is the wreck! Where is the savior?

Suddenly, amidst the confusion and alarm, there is a whiz of ruddy light, and there, vivid, in a sort of orb of ruddy bloom, stands a figure, holding high above his head a baton, from which flares the fire. It is a patrol of the Life-Saving Service. They stare at him from their unsteady deck. A cheer bursts out from them! "God be thanked! we are seen! help is at hand!" Then, in the last flicker of the expiring Coston light, their hearts sink again, as they see the patrolman race away. He bounds off to the station. It is near 3 o'clock in the dark January morning. By 4 he is back again, now as one of a crew of seven whom he has summoned. They are all hot and blowed, and splashed from head to foot with the mire of a winter road, through which, for a mile, they have dragged the surf-boat. They pause only to take a look! Then they bend, all together, to the launch. Along the beach is a wall of ice 3 feet high, over which they clamber, slipping and floundering with the heavy boat. Once over the barier they drag on, over great jags and bowlders of ice which pave the beach, to the edge of the water. There before them is a boiling surf, full of enormous ice-cakes. Whitening, thundering, crashing, and rising, spreading, and tumbling incessantly the slabs of ice with deafening uproar, looms that appalling abattis of breakers through which they will force out the boat to the vesel. In vain! Drenched and bruised, blown and reeking with the effort, they again clamber over the ice barrier. Another crew from a more distant station arrives, and the keeper in command gasps out the order which sends the men to the station for the mortar apparatus. Boats are useless. Now for the ordnance! The wreck artillery arrives and prepares for action. Suddenly the keeper sees a light near the water, alongside the steamer. His heart bounds in fear. It is the old folly. A boat from the ship to the shore! The deep-water sailor sees only the smooth line of the shore, instead of a swarm of enormous turbines, whirling all under and into the caverns of the brine! Keeper and beachman rush forward with their warning cries by voice and trumpet. In vain! The light starts on its phantom passage. It is borne in a boat with twelve sailors! Like the specter from the shadow of the steamer they see the little white craft emerge upon the summit of a huge wave. One moment's poise, and it flies smoothly toward them, so swiftly, so lightly, that it seems in one second more it will be upon the shore, and then in another instant, as by some deft magic, it has feathered over, crewless and keel upward, caught in the turbine wheels of the surf. Has the crew perished? No. Dark spots are seen struggling in the sea, and the voice of the keeper bursts forth with the loud "Come on, over the ice-wall, men!" They plunge into the under-tow. There they are braced on legs of bronze, resisting with all the might of hip and loin the hideous suck and swirl of the waters, staving off the ice-slabs, and clutching for the drowning men! Four of these figures are dragged from the surf. They are heaved upward over the icy barrier. Another powerful tussel in the foam, and they master four more. Another desperate struggle and one more is saved. Two more are seen, but can not be saved. Another struggle and the gallant keeper totters, gripped by a drowning man; the under-tow, like an accomplice, winds around him and throws him down; the mad body clings to him and he can not rise. In that moment of awful extremity the sea floods in upon them with its deathful roar, lifts and throws them inland, but before it can wash them back the keeper catches at a pile of ice and holds on. This enables him to resist the fearful siphonage of the under-tow, and with a desperate effort he regains his feet and makes for the shore. It is his last chance for life—a single second's delay and the surge may wash him down—but in that moment he does not forget that there is another life to save besides his own, and furious, with the sea upon his heels, he seizes his man and staggers on, dragging this human weight behind him. A mate rushes to his assistance; the surf falls in a crushing flood behind them. They are safe and one more body rescued. Of the twelve men of the boat's crew three have perished. Nine have been drawn from the ocean by this little band of heroes. [Long-continued applause.]

Is this a fanciful picture? No! This is what took place at the wreck of the French steamer Amerique, near Seabright, N. J., on the 11th of January, 1877. The day was Sunday. A Sabbath day for a Sabbath deed. That heroic keeper, whose breast deserves to be covered with decorations, was Abner H. West, of Station No. 3. Those three men, deserving of equal honor, who wrought with him in the ice and undertow to save those lives, and whose names I regret I do not know, were members of the station crew. How they and their mates toiled later and achieved that splendid rescue of all on board the French steamer, with which the country rang, is a matter of public record. Such labor and danger! Is there a splendor equal to its heroism? How that day they traversed the shore between the station and the wreck, lugging their heavy cart, before they could get the mortar apparatus and life-car to the scene; how, after two hours of hard pulling and hauling, they were there with it, drenched with sweat, clotted with mire, alive with energy; how, with thud and gun-flash, their shot lines fled swishing to the steamer, the hawser and the hauling-lines dragged aboard; how day broke, and again, with desperate labor, the effort was made to launch the boat through the surf and ice-floes; how difficult it was to get near the vessel, to make her foreign officers understand how to attach the life-lines; how, at last, the launch was achieved, and, despite the breakers and currents which engirt the steamer with a circle of hell-pools, the boat's crew got near enough to make their instructions known, and the slender bridge of rope for the life-car, narrow as the line Mohammed saw floating across the gulf to Paradise, was drawn taut from the vessel to the shore—these were a few of the incidents of that night and day. To and fro, hung by its rings to the hawser, and hauled backward and forward by those arms of brawn, sped the life-car with its burden of human lives—six or eight at a time, men, women, and children, till all were landed. Then the baggage of the passengers, the trunks with their wealth of apparel and adornment, the mails with their written weight of more than wealth, and the bullion of the Treasury, followed the delivered lives in the same car. First, as I have said elsewhere, we save the man, and then his gems and gold. Is there salvage sufficient to recompense such service?

The Amerique was seen by the patrolman at 3 o'clock in the morning. They toiled incessantly, never pausing for a mouthful of food or to change their soaked clothing—stern, pale, unflagging, bemired, bedraggled, rough, weary, indomitable, and magnificent. Such were they, and such, in very feeble outlines and faint colors, have I endeavored to display their heroic work at the wreck of the Amerique on that Sabbath day which they thus kept holy. Laborare est orare.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, it is impossible personally not to felicitate myself upon having given much earnest study to this life-saving legislation. It would not perhaps be in good taste to boast of having been instrumental in its organization and improvement. The inspiration for what I have done, however, came out of a storm upon the Scilly Isles in the winter of 1868, when a great steamer barely escaped shipwreck. It was the worst tempest in thirty years upon that coast. When we arrived in port the day after the peril, the English journals were full of the glorious exploits by rocket and signal and coast-guard and mortar and life-boat. I wondered if so much could be done in England, with her forty-five hundred miles of coast line, why should not our country, with double that number of miles, have a similarly effective service? It was this that led me to propose what the superintendent of the service called the efficient beginning of the patrol of the Jersey coast. Since that time how much has been done for the well-being and rescue of imperiled human life. How much of comfort and joy has been vouchsafed to families and friends of the beneficiaries, of that mercy which droppeth as the gentle rains from heaven in this warm-hearted legislation, blessing and blessed.

REWARD OF THE SERVICE.

Mr. Speaker, I have spent the best part of my life in this public service; most of it has been like writing in water. The reminiscences of party wrangling and political strife seem to me like nebulæ of the past, without form and almost void. Gladly I would if I could, for many reasons growing out of personal inconvenience and party incompetency, reverse much that I have done here. Confessing so much inadequacy, recalling so many that have come and gone from this House—gone, many of them, to another sphere, and I hope and trust a better world—I would gladly lay down my commission and turn to other duties, which the lapse of time admonishes me should have attention. But what little I have accomplished in connection with this Life-Saving Service is compensation "sweeter than the honey in the honeycomb." It is its own exceeding great reward. It speaks to me in the voices of the rescued—ay, in tears of speechless feeling; speaks of resurrection from death, "in spite of wreck and tempest's roar, in spite of false lights on shore;" speaks of a faith triumphant over all fears in the better elements of our human nature. It sounds like undulations of the Sabbath bell ringing in peace and felicity. It comes to me in the words of Him who, regardless of His own life, gave it freely that other lives might be saved.

Humanity and civilization should walk white-handed along with government. They strengthen and save society. In the perils which environ our country, from passion and prejudice, from old animosities and new irritations, let us do good deeds, pray hopefully that our vessels of state be free from leakage, collision, wreck, and loss. Send out the life-boat; fire the line over the imperiled vessel; free the hawser for the life-car, and then with stout hearts and thankful souls lift up our prayer to Him who holds the sea in the hollow of His hand:

Jesu, bless our gallant boat,
By the torrent swept along;
Loud its threatenings—let them not
Drown the music of a song
Breathed thy mercy to implore
Where these troubled waters roar.

Guide our bark among the waves,
Through the surf our passage smooth,
Where the whirlpool frets and raves
Let thy love its anger soothe,
All our hope is placed in Thee.
Miserere, Domine.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COX moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RECALL OF BILL.

The SPEAKER. The bill (H. R. 8117) granting a pension to Mrs. Juliet G. Howe was laid upon the table of the House on the 20th of April, but by mistake was engrossed and transmitted to the Senate as having passed the House. If there be no objection, an order will be made recalling the bill from the Senate.

There was no objection.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER. The bill (H. R. 6803) for the relief of Augusta Heiss and Theodore Heiss was erroneously referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. The bill involves a claim, and the Committee on Rivers and Harbors should be discharged from its further consideration and the bill referred to the Committee on Claims.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

REGISTRY OF BARGES.

Mr. KEAN. I call up for consideration at this time the bill (S. 1483) for the registry of the barges Albert M, Condor, and Adelante.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioner of Navigation is hereby authorized to admit to registry, as vessels of the United States, the following-named foreign vessels, owned by John Scully, of South Amboy, N. J., on satisfactory proof that he is a citizen of the United States, namely, the Albert M, the Condor, and the Adelante.

Mr. KEAN. I ask for the reading of the report of the Committee on Commerce. Or if gentlemen do not care to hear the report I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

The report (by Mr. CRISP) is as follows:

The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6072) for the registry of the barges Albert M, Condor, and Adelante, have had same under consideration, and beg leave to report as follows:

It appears from the papers in this case that the vessels named in the bill were not actually wrecked in American waters, as required by the law, but being old and unseaworthy they were unfit for navigation. According to an opinion of the Attorney-General the word "wrecked," as used in section 4136 of the Revised Statutes, is applicable to a vessel which is disabled and rendered unfit for navigation, by whatever casualty this condition may have been caused.

Believing that these barges are prevented from getting registry under the law by a mere technicality of this law, and that there will be no departure from the intent of the law if the registry asked for in this case is allowed, your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KEAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MILLS. I ask unanimous consent that any member be allowed to print in the RECORD any remarks he may wish to present on the tariff, and also that there be a general leave to extend in the RECORD any remarks delivered in the House.

Mr. REED. I object to that request for the present.

Mr. MILLS. I ask unanimous consent that this evening a recess be taken at 5 o'clock until 8 o'clock.

Mr. HOPKINS, of New York. I object.

Mr. MILLS. When the proper time arrives I will move that the House take a recess, and I hope that proposition will be agreed to by a vote of the House. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of revenue measures.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

TARIFF.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill the title of which the Clerk will read:

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the revenue.

Mr. MILLS. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] be allowed to continue their remarks until they get through; that they shall not be governed by the hour rule.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, next in importance to personal liberty is the question of how and how much the people shall be taxed; and this is the subject for consideration to-day. As it pertains to taxation it is no new question, but was with us in the beginning of our Government, and will be with us to its close. He who advocates the present tariff favors a tariff not for revenue, not for protection merely, but a tariff for surplus and a tariff for trusts.

We are confronted with an anomalous state of affairs. We have, locked up in the Treasury, beyond the demands of the Government, about $108,000,000 and will have $150,000,000 in June, or $2.50 for every inhabitant—more than $180 for every day since the Saviour was born into the world. What is the cause of this overflowing Treasury? What is the cause of this accumulation beside which that of all other countries sinks into insignificance? What is the cause of hoarding in the Treasury at Washington more money than is gathered into the treasury of any monarchy, kingdom, or despotism under the sun? The answer to all these questions is, the people have been taxed beyond the reasonable demands of the Government. Robbery of them under the forms of law has been perpetrated; and to-day they stand moneyless, the tax-gatherer staring them in the face, and demand relief at our hands. Will we give it, or will we withhold it?

LABOR TROUBLES.

Mr. Chairman, I have had access to the advance sheets of the forthcoming third annual report of Hon. Carroll D. Wright, Commissioner of Labor. I wish to quote from it to show that twenty-seven years of alleged protection has not resulted in that peace, quiet, and prosperity to the laborers which it was claimed would follow it.

In the six years from 1881 to 1886 there have been strikes in 22,336 establishments. Of these, 16,692, or 74.74 per cent., were in the States of New York, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, Ohio, and Illinois, where protection is claimed to have wrought such wonders for the laboring man.

There were lockouts during the same period in 2,182 establishments. Of these 1,981, or 90.8 per cent., occurred in the five States named. The number of employés striking and involved was 1,324,152. In addition to these there were 159,548 employés locked out, 31.22 per cent. of whom were females.

Of the 22,336 establishments in which strikes occurred, the strikes in 18,342, or 82.12 per cent. of the whole, were ordered by labor organizations; while of the 2,182 establishments in which lockouts occurred 1,753, or 80.34 per cent., were ordered by combinations of managers.

Concerning the loss to employés resulting from these disturbances the report will say:

Understanding, then, the difficulties in ascertaining the exact loss of employers and employés as resulting from strikes and lockouts, reference may be had to the summaries, where the information which has been collected is grouped. The loss to the strikers, as given in these tables, for the period involved was $51,819,163. The loss to employés through lockouts for the same period was $8,132,717; or a total wage loss to employés of $59,951,880. This loss occurred for both strikes and lockouts in 24,518 establishments, or an average loss of $2,445 to each establishment, and of nearly $40 to each person involved.

Will any gentleman say, in the face of these great disturbances, that the condition of the labor of this country is entirely satisfactory to the laborer? Has he derived that unmixed blessing from high taxation which was promised him? The tendency of our present legislation, I regret to say, is to make millionaires and paupers. Under the lower tariff rates of years gone by, when taxation was imposed to carry on the Government, the word "tramp" was not daily and hourly heard. The anarchist, the socialist, and the communist were also unknown in our midst.

Our rate of wages is higher than the rate in the Old World, and would be so under any tariff law that we would impose. The gentleman from Texas has very tersely and truly demonstrated the fact that the higher our wages the lower the labor cost of the product. If tariffs give high wages, why is it that labor in England is so much higher than it is in France or Germany, the latter countries having protective tariffs and England having none? Why is it that our manufacturing journals of this country begin to declare that the danger of our people lies in the cheap labor of Germany instead of the cheap labor of England?

With the highest-priced labor in the world, we send over their tariffs to Germany and France, having the cheap labor, machinery, stoves, ranges, hardware, tools, machine-needles, mechanical and scientific instruments, cutlery, fire-arms, printing-presses, locks, hinges, sewing-machines, clocks, watches, and pianos, and so far as I have been able to trace the relation I find that the more labor we get into a commodity the more certainly we can compete successfully with the old country. One of the manufacturers of pianos alone in this country sends five hundred pianos per annum to England.

PRESIDENTIAL RECOMMENDATIONS.

Sir, I congratulate the country that we have reached the point where there is a fair chance for the consideration of a bill looking to the reduction of the taxes on the necessaries of life. Heretofore the favorite method pursued in the killing of tariff bills was either by refusing to consider them or by striking out the enacting clause. But I think we are fortunate in having before us now a bill which this Congress dare not refuse to consider, and of which its members dare not be rash enough to strike out the enacting clause.

Sir, for seven long years different Presidents have called upon Congress to discharge its duty and diminish taxation.

President Arthur called the attention of Congress, in his first annual message, to our excessive taxation in the following language:

It seems to me that the time has arrived when the people may justly demand some relief from their present onerous burden.

In his second he said:

I heartily approve the Secretary's recommendation of immediate and extensive reductions in the annual revenues of the Government.

In 1883, even after the present law was passed, in his annual message he said that he had no doubt that still further reductions might be wisely made.

But not ready to settle the question, Congress shifted its responsibility off to a tariff commission, and sent a band of itinerant patriots around the country to report what ought to be done. That commission consisted of men who were appointed from different industries because of their known favor to them; but the public clamor for tax reduction was so great and the necessity for it so patent that even they could not ignore the fact, and they reported that there should be a reduction of from 20 to 25 per cent. The Congress that appointed them, finding the rate of taxation averaged about 43 per cent., under the pretense of revising it, left it so that it has since reached 47 per cent., and the people have had no relief. It is higher to-day than it was any time during the late civil war.

Worn out with waiting, disgusted with the hesitation of the Congress that misrepresented the best interests of the country, they freed themselves from those who appointed the commission and refused to heed its recommendation, and sent here a different class of representatives, and to the White House a man of a different political party.

President Cleveland, in his first annual message, urged Congress to give this relief; and the Ways and Means Committee reported a bill making reductions averaging about 20 per cent.; but the gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber, aided by a few on this, succeeded in declining to even consider the bill, declined to make any effort to better it. A good many were left at home, and others were sent here in their stead, and still the question is here.

I quote the following from the last annual message of President Cleveland, who seems to have felt the gravity of the situation, and had all the manly courage and able statesmanship necessary to discharge fearlessly his duty and let the consequences take care of themselves:

When we consider that the theory of our institutions guaranties to every citizen the full enjoyment of all the fruits of his industry and enterprise, with only such deduction as may be his share towards the careful and economical maintenance of the Government which protects him, it is plain that the exaction of more than this is indefensible extortion and a culpable betrayal of American fairness and justice. This wrong inflicted upon those who bear the burden of national taxation, like other wrongs, multiplies a brood of evil consequences. The public Treasury, which should only exist as a conduit, conveying the people's tribute to its legitimate objects of expenditure, becomes a hoarding-place for money needlessly withdrawn from trade and the people's use, thus crippling our national energies, suspending our country's development, preventing investment in productive enterprise, threatening financial disturbance, and inviting schemes of public plunder.

Mr. Chairman, I will be pardoned for commenting a little more upon the surplus that is accumulating and the evils that are likely to grow out of it. We are drawing money from commerce and locking it up in the Treasury at such a rate that it is only a question of time when stringency will set in, panics begin, and ruin follow. We are robbing not only commerce of its life-blood but the people of the means of paying their taxes to their governments—municipal, county, State, and Federal—and their debts to their creditors. All sorts of jobs are proposed to Congress and all sorts of jobbers are flocking here. There is nothing conceivable more corrupting to government than a plethoric treasury. It revives stale demands; it encourages the prosecution of matters long since set at rest.

WHO RESISTED TARIFF REDUCTION.

The gentlemen of the minority in presenting their views have commented with severity upon the fact that hitherto the Democratic party has not reduced taxation. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCKINLEY] is credited with the authorship of that document. Listen to the arraignment with which he adorns the pages of his "florid production:"

If it be claimed that for the most part during the Democratic control of the House the Senate was dominated by the Republican party, and therefore the responsibility of failure to reduce the revenues should be alike shared by them, we answer that under the Constitution of the United States the House alone can originate bills to reduce taxation, the Senate having no jurisdiction of the subject until it is given to it by a bill which passes the House, and that during all these years no such bill has gone from the House to the Senate, and therefore the sole responsibility for failure rests with the present majority in the House of Representatives.

Now, sir, I know of no better person to answer this charge made by the gentleman from Ohio than the gentleman from Ohio himself. He made a speech in Congress a few years ago in which he with equal severity arraigned the Democratic party for attempting to reduce taxation. I quote from that speech, and it will be observed that in this last quotation, which was his first utterance, he takes upon himself and the small number of Democrats whom he could get to act with him the responsibility with which he now charges the Democratic party:

The Democratic majorities in the Forty-fourth, Forty-fifth, and Forty-sixth Congresses, although committed by party utterances and by platforms, as well as the pledges of leaders, to a reduction of duties to a revenue basis, were unable, with all their party machinery and the free use of the party lash, to accomplish even a step in that direction. Every proposition for a change was met with the almost solid opposition of this side of the House, which, with the assistance of a few Representatives on the other side from Pennsylvania and the New England States, was strong enough to insure and did insure the substantial defeat of every measure looking to a disturbance of the existing tariff rates.

What shall we think of statesmanship which, forgetting its own record, charges upon its antagonist that which it has confessed to be its own fault?

INTERNAL REVENUE.

Sir, the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] has delivered an able and characteristic speech, clamoring for the total repeal of the internal-revenue system. He arraigns the Democratic party for not repealing it; and without stint or moderation he uncorked and poured forth his vials of wrath upon that system and upon those who now refuse, at his behest, to create a deficiency by repealing it. Was the Democratic party the author of this law? Did the Democratic party put it upon the statute-book? Did we enact those stringent provisions under which citizens have been incarcerated, under which property has been seized and destroyed without process of law, and under which the Federal courts of the country have been filled to overflowing with men charged with violation of the internal-revenue laws? No, sir.

Mr. KELLEY. Does the gentleman wish a reply? I will not interrupt him otherwise.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I have no objection to the interruption.

Mr. KELLEY. The Democratic party did not enact that law. It only made it necessary for the Republican party, which remained in Congress during the war, to provide the sinews for that war, and thus forced it to resort to internal taxes and all the hardships involved in their collection. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MCMILLIN. But the gentleman from Pennsylvania imposed other internal taxes at the same time. He put a tax upon income, and a tax upon railroads. He put a tax upon the capital and deposits of national banks. They were a tax on accumulated wealth which at all times should be made to help support the Government that protects it. But those taxes have all been removed, and by his help; but the one that he says works hardship he never removed. Imagine my surprise when I turn back to the RECORD and see among those who enacted this law the name of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania. When charging long and loud that we refused to repeal the system, does he forget that only five short years ago he was the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee and was the leader of the House of Representatives in the Republican organization, and that upon him devolved the responsibility of framing a bill for the reduction of taxation to relieve the people from burdens? Does he remember that he declined to take off what he now charges the Democratic party with being culpable for not removing?

Does he forget that ten years before that occurred he had announced publicly, privately, and everywhere that he was in favor of the repeal of the internal-revenue system, and yet does he now forget that he failed then to do, or even to propose to do, the very thing which he now says the Democratic party is culpable for not doing? Then he had responsibility resting upon him, and was careful about his action. He said then that he favored taking them off, but did not do it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. KELLEY. He proposed to repeal the internal taxes——

Mr. MCMILLIN. I remember the gentleman's utterances. I remember his coming before this House and saying that he favored the repeal of that system, but that his caucus had determined otherwise and that he bowed his neck to the yoke. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. KELLEY. Has not that been done with like effect now by the Democratic caucus?

Mr. MCMILLIN. No, sir. Why does not the gentleman from Pennsylvania offer a substitute now and show that his side would repeal those taxes if the responsibility rested upon them to-day?

Mr. KELLEY. When we come to amendments you will find that I will offer one, and make you vote on it, too. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. MCMILLIN. Does your party favor a total repeal of internal taxes?

Mr. KELLEY. I speak for myself [jeers on the Democratic side], and say I do.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Who will speak for your party if you, the oldest member on that side, will not? [Applause.]

Mr. KELLEY. Will you vote for such an amendment?

Mr. MCMILLIN. I do not propose to vote for such an amendment while its adoption would create a deficiency of $60,000,000 a year, which would have to be raised by increase of taxes on necessaries. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. REED. Then what are you talking about? [Laughter.]

Mr. McMILLIN. And I think I voice the Democratic party when I say they will not do this. [Applause.]

Now, as this is a friendly conversation between me and my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY], I ask him upon what he proposes to place the $60,000,000 of taxes when he repeals the internal-revenue system? Does he propose to replace the tax on tea and coffee? Does he?

Mr. KELLEY. No.

Mr. McMILLIN. No, sir; you have not the courage to do it.

Mr. KELLEY. Have you and your party the courage to tax tea and coffee?

Mr. McMILLIN. No, sir. We do not propose to so legislate as to force a reimposition of the tax on tea and coffee.

Mr. KELLEY. As we are in this friendly conversation, I ask the gentleman, would the revenues of the Government be endangered by repealing the tobacco tax, including the $12,000,000 derived from cigars, cheroots, and cigarettes?

Mr. McMILLIN. With the same candor that the gentleman has shown in asking the question, I answer that it would not be endangered.

Mr. KELLEY. Then why do you not repeal the entire tax?

Mr. McMILLIN. The House would not pass such a proposition.

On yesterday there was presented to the Senate the petition of seventy ministers of the gospel, between three and four hundred teachers in the public schools of Washington, and one hundred and twenty physicians of this city, in favor of enacting laws in the District of Columbia that would prevent the sale of cheroots or cigarettes to children under sixteen years of age.

Mr. KELLEY. I will vote for it.

Mr. McMILLIN. Yes, you will vote for it.

Mr. KELLEY. Yes.

Mr. McMILLIN. But at the same time you say you will vote to give them cheaper cheroots and cigarettes. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. KELLEY. Do we legislate for cities and States, and is not the question one of police and within their jurisdiction? I would repeal the national tax, and let the municipal authorities and the States derive their revenues from it.

Mr. McMILLIN. No gentleman on this floor would more cheerfully return to the States those powers, duties, and responsibilities that have been filched from them by the Federal Government than I would. Too many State powers have been absorbed by the Federal Government. But when I come to a point, Mr. Chairman, where I have to select the subjects upon which I will place taxation, I believe it is sound political policy to place it upon those things that the people can do without, which are not essential to their very comfort and existence, rather than upon the necessaries of life. I have striven to mollify internal-revenue laws, and by this bill more is done in that direction than by any other ever proposed to Congress since the system was inaugurated.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman allow me a moment further in an amicable spirit? I feel that in interposing already I have been guilty of a trespass which I could not have borne as patiently as the gentleman has; and I desire to say that unless he demands an interruption from me, I shall listen attentively to him, but not break the thread of his discourse by any remarks of mine.

Mr. McMILLIN. I would certainly not persecute the gentleman with any interrogatories after he is fatigued with answering. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. KELLEY. Oh! Put the questions and you will find an answer at hand for each of them. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. McMILLIN. Now, Mr. Chairman, when interrupted I was going on to state the facts concerning the internal-revenue system. It yields, in round numbers, one hundred and twenty millions of revenue to the Government. The annual surplus is only about sixty millions; so that if all the internal-revenue laws were repealed, it would leave a deficiency in our taxes of sixty millions a year. What is this deficiency to be raised from? Shall we reimpose a tax on tea and coffee? No. There is not a man here who would retax coffee to untax whisky. Shall we increase the duties on woolen goods, rice, or sugar? No; for the people would not and should not tolerate any such legislation. Then, sir, we have to select the subjects from which we will reduce taxes; and in view of the fact that we can not repeal the internal-revenue system, we have to determine whether we will reduce the tax on whisky or the tax on clothing; the tax on whisky or the tax on sugar. In other words, reduce the tax on that without which men can live and prosper, or upon that which is essential to their very comfort and existence. When it narrows itself down to a contest between the drinking man's appetite and the poor man's back, I do not hesitate to say that we espouse the cause of the back, and defy the world, the flesh, and the devil in the fight. [Laughter and applause.]

No, sir, the gentleman from Pennsylvania did not repeal the internal taxes when the opportunity was presented to him. He would not do so to-day if upon him rested the responsibility of leadership of this House. Not only did he not do that, but he did not repeal those oppressive and obnoxious statutes without which the system could not have been run in the beginning and can be successfully operated now. But there was a class to whose rescue he rushed. There was a class when they held up their hands to the distinguished gentleman and said "Help me, Cassius, or I sink," for whom he braved the tide and the waves, and rushed into the flood to their rescue. There has been a tax imposed upon the capital and deposits of banks and on checks. If it ever landed anybody into the Federal courts, we did not hear of it. If it ever bankrupted anybody, we never knew it. If it ever worked any serious hardship, the man has not appeared upon whom it was wrought. It yielded to the Government more than eleven millions of dollars. It was a tax on wealth; yet these were the people in whose behalf, with feverish anxiety and impetuous haste, the gentleman from Pennsylvania made his exertions.

Your patent-medicine man, "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup," perfumery and cosmetics, and all manner of nostrums, were also the recipients of his statecraft and patriotic exertions, but when it came to free the citizen from the oppression that destroyed his property—without due process of law—it was so insignificant a subject that the distinguished gentleman never made an exertion to mollify the hardship of any law or to better the condition of any citizen.

Listen to the plaintive wail with which the gentleman from Pennsylvania speaks of the oppressions of taxation when it is imposed on national banks, those poor corporations created by the Government, to whom it has loaned its credit with such lavish hands, and that have never paid a single dollar of taxes on the bonds upon which their circulation is founded to the county, State, or National Government:

> I confess that I can not see the reason that animates any man to wantonly retain a tax on bankers for the mere purpose of branding them invidiously and locking up in idleness in the Treasury of the United States the taxes abstracted from them.—Congressional Record, Forty-seventh Congress, first session, page 5192.

But the distinguished gentleman has not the same sympathetic anxiety for the man who pays high taxes on sugar, high taxes on salt, high taxes on clothing. Although this man has no money deposited in bank; although he has no bonds that are not taxable upon which he gets a circulation to be loaned out to the people; although he lives after the commandment of God, "By the sweat of his brow," my distinguished friend is not able to see that it is wrong to take money from him that the Government does not need and locking it up in the Treasury. It makes all the difference in the world with the gentleman from Pennsylvania whose ox is gored. He says the passage of this bill will instantly paralyze the country, enterprise and energy of the people. How reducing the cost of salt, cotton goods, woolen clothes, and tin roofing will paralyze any man is hard to understand.

Mr. Chairman, what is the bill that we present for your consideration? It is a bill which proposes to take $878,000 off of chemicals; $1,756,000 off of earthen and glass ware; $1,480,000 off of sugar; $11,000 off of tobacco; $331,000 off of provisions; $227,000 off of cotton goods; $2,042,000 off of hemp, jute, and flax goods; $12,330,000 off of woolens; $3,000 off of books and papers, and $1,079,000 off of sundries. It is also proposed to add to your free-list flax, hemp, jute, chemicals, and salt, tin-plate, wool, and other things, amounting to $22,189,000, making in all a tariff reduction of $53,720,000. It proposes to make reductions in the internal revenue of $24,455,000, or a grand total of tax reduction from tariff and internal-revenue sources of $78,176,000—more than a dollar and a quarter to every individual, or $6 for every family in the United States. And the plain, simple question presented here to-day is: Will we take this burden off or will we leave it on? Will we free commerce by leaving it unshackled or will we keep it hampered? Will we continue to hoard up a corrupting surplus or will we leave the money in the pockets of the people, where it justly belongs? These are the grave questions which confront us, and these are the subjects upon which we are to act:

	Per cent.
Present rate on dutiable goods	47.19
Proposed rate on dutiable goods	40.00
Present rate on articles affected by bill	51.16
Proposed rate on articles affected by bill	33.36

Several of the schedules of the more luxurious articles are not touched.

What more have we proposed for your adoption? We recommend to you very material changes in the laws governing the collection of the internal revenue. Heretofore, by statutes of the United States, internal-revenue officers have been authorized, upon the seizure of property which they suppose to be used in illicit distilling, to destroy it in advance of presentment or indictment of the owner or trial, and hence to destroy it without due process of law upon mere suspicion. We recommend that you change this, believing that the Government should not set the example of destruction of the property of the citizen until after he has had a chance for a hearing before some tribunal of his country. We recommend to you the repeal of what was known as the minimum-punishment clause, contained in the laws fixing penalties for the violation of internal-revenue laws. The maximum remains unchanged, and it gives to the court trying the cause jurisdiction to impose a less penalty than that fixed now by law, if in its judgment justice demands it. We recommend to you the repeal of license taxes imposed on retail dealers, for the reason that most of the indictments now found in the Federal courts and the oppressions growing out of the system originally were from these sources, and we believe that the law can be as well enforced without as with them.

All laws which restrain the producer of tobacco from selling it to whom he pleases and in any form except cigars, cigarettes, and cheroots are also proposed to be repealed; and we believe by the adoption of the bill which is now before the House, repealing the internal-revenue taxes to the amount of $24,000,000, that those hardships and oppressions of which there has been so much complaint will be removed.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania spent much of his time and most of his fervor in a tirade against Kentucky, and attributes her want of development of her resources to the tax on whisky. He advocates the removal of that tax. I am not going into an extended defense of that magnificent State or her grand people. They speak for themselves, and besides have representatives here who are amply able to take care of her, even when assaulted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. But I want to stir up his pure mind by way of remembrance on one little thing or two of which he seems to have been profoundly oblivious when traducing that State. He had forgotten the fact that the last annual report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shows that whereas Kentucky has 3,702 retail dealers in spirits and malt liquors, Pennsylvania has 20,425. Comparing these figures with the census—and we have no reliable data as to population since—it gives one saloon for every four hundred and forty-five inhabitants in Kentucky and one to every two hundred and nine inhabitants in the great State of Pennsylvania. I have to announce to this House and the country that the gentleman from Pennsylvania has revolutionized on the question of free raw materials. He stands here to-day clamoring for it. Not free raw materials for his factories and furnaces; not free raw materials for his forges and foundries; not free raw materials for his carpet looms and woolen establishments, but he is exceedingly anxious for free raw materials for his twenty thousand saloons.

He announced in a speech some years ago that the consumer pays the tax imposed upon the commodity. It is not surprising, therefore, that holding to that faith he should wish a little less internal tax on this very flourishing industry.

PRESIDENT GRANT ON FREE WOOL.

The minority of the Committee on Ways and Means, and other gentlemen opposing tax reduction, have lain a great deal of stress on the injustice done by the proposed removal of the duty on wool and other articles added to the free-list. I submit for their consideration the fact that among the earliest suggestions—so far as I know, the earliest suggestion—since the war for the removal of the duty on wool came from the distinguished Chief Executive whom they twice honored with an election to the Presidency and attempted to elevate to that position a third time, President Grant. In his annual message submitted to Congress December 7, 1874, he made the following recommendation:

> I would suggest to Congress the propriety of readjusting the tariff so as to increase the revenue and at the same time decrease the number of articles upon which duties are levied. Those articles which enter into our manufactures and are not produced at home, it seems to me, should be entered free. Those articles of manufacture which we produce a constituent part of but do not produce the whole, that part which we do not produce should enter free also. I will instance fine wool, dyes, etc. These articles must be imported to form a part of the manufacture of the higher grades of woolen goods. Chemicals used as dyes, compounded in medicines and used in various ways in manufactures, come under this class. The introduction, free of duty, of such wools as we do not produce would stimulate the manufacture of goods requiring the use of those we do produce, and therefore would be a benefit to home production. There are many articles entering into home manufacture which we do not produce ourselves, the tariff upon which increases the cost of producing the manufactured article. All corrections in this regard are in the direction of bringing labor and capital in harmony with each other, and of supplying one of the elements of prosperity so much needed.

It will also be remembered in this connection that the first tariff law adopted was framed by Madison, the father of the Constitution, 1789. And contemporaneous with the public service President Washington and Mr. Jefferson left wool on the free-list. I would digress also far enough in this connection to ask why is it that in all the years from that time until 1807 there never was a tariff that aggregated 31 per cent.?

Mr. Chairman, of all the sufferers by this oppressive taxation the farmer is the greatest. With wheat at less than 80 cents, cotton at a rate that barely pays for production, corn so low that it will scarcely bear shipment, he toils from eight to fourteen hours a day and gets none of the benefits of the high tax. He has to sell his commodities in the lowest markets of the world and buy in the highest. The result on him has been disastrous in the extreme. The records of agricultural regions show a frightful increase of mortgages. The mortgages upon the farmers of the Northwest are startling to contemplate.

PRESIDENT CLEVELAND ON THE INTERESTS OF LABOR.

There is a statement made and reiterated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania which I think deserves more than a passing notice. It is that wherein he speaks of the President's message as a "free-trade message." The minority report also uses this phrase to characterize it. I am not willing that the opinions of the country shall be based upon the assertions of gentlemen who are averse to the President in every political sentiment. I therefore read from the message itself, that this House and the country may determine whether or not it is a free-trade document:

> It is not proposed to entirely relieve the country of this tariff taxation. It must be extensively continued as the source of the Government's income, and in a readjustment of our tariff the interests of American labor engaged in manufacture should be carefully considered, as well as the preservation of our manufacturers. It may be called protection, or by any other name, but relief from the hardships and dangers of our present tariff laws should be devised with especial precaution against imperiling the existence of our manufacturing interests.

Again:

> It is also said that the increase in the price of domestic manufactures resulting from the present tariff is necessary in order that higher wages may be paid to our workingmen employed in manufactories than are paid for what is called the pauper labor of Europe. All will acknowledge the force of an argument which involves the welfare and liberal compensation of our laboring people. Our labor is honorable in the eyes of every American citizen, and as it lies at the foundation of our development and progress it is entitled, without affectation or hypocrisy, to the utmost regard. The standard of our laborer's life should not be measured by that of any other country less favored, and they are entitled to their full share of all our advantages.

The following paragraph also bears upon this subject:

> To these the appeal is made to save their employment and maintain their wages by resisting a change. There should be no disposition to answer such suggestions by the allegation that they are in a minority among those who labor, and therefore should forego an advantage in the interest of low prices for the majority; their compensation, as it may be affected by the operation of tariff laws, should at all times be scrupulously kept in view; and yet with slight reflection they will not overlook the fact that they are consumers with the rest; that they, too, have their own wants and those of their families to supply from their earnings, and that the price of the necessaries of life as well as the amount of their wages will regulate the measure of their welfare and comfort.
> But the reduction of taxation demanded should be so measured as not to necessitate or justify either the loss of employment by the workingman nor the lessening of his wages; and the profits still remaining to the manufacturer, after a necessary readjustment, should furnish no excuse for the sacrifice of the interests of his employés either in their opportunity to work or in the diminution of their compensation.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to compare the record of the gentleman from Pennsylvania with that of the distinguished President of the United States, whose message he criticises. Let us compare their action on one subject that is of vital importance to the laboring man, and see if we can not get some additional light. The gentleman from Pennsylvania was a member of Congress in 1864, and on the anniversary of our country's liberty an act was passed by him and those acting with him which has only to be read to be most heartily despised. It is what is now known as the "contract-labor law." There was a clause in the Constitution which forbade the re-establishment of the African slave trade, but this opening of something like a Caucasian slave trade was made legitimate by the statute which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

> SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That all contracts that shall be made by emigrants to the United States in foreign countries, in conformity to regulations that may be established by the said commissioner, whereby emigrants shall pledge the wages of their labor for a term not exceeding twelve months, to repay the expenses of their emigration, shall be held to be valid in law, and may be enforced in the courts of the United States or of the several States and Territories; and such advances, if so stipulated in the contract, and the contract be recorded in the recorder's office in the country where the emigrant shall settle, shall operate as a lien upon any land thereafter acquired by the emigrant, whether under the homestead law when the title is consummated, or on property otherwise acquired until liquidated by the emigrant; but nothing herein contained shall be deemed to authorize any contract contravening the Constitution of the United States, or creating in any way the relation of slavery or servitude. (U. S. Stats. at Large, vol. 15, 1863-'65.)

Mr. WEAVER. Who signed the act which has been read?

Mr. McMILLIN. It passed during President Lincoln's term; but I do not know whether it received his signature or became a law by ten days' limitation.

Mr. KELLEY. Will you let me say a word in defense of Lincoln?

Mr. McMILLIN. Until the gentleman gets through defending himself, he will have to let Lincoln take care of himself. "Physician, heal thyself." It is not Lincoln who is in danger; it is my friend from Pennsylvania. [Applause.]

Mr. KELLEY. Do not violate Lincoln's grave!

Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman can not take refuge behind the grave-stone of that great and patriotic man. [Applause.]

Not only were foreigners to be brought here by contract, but their services for a year were made liable for the fulfillment of the contracts, and any little home which they acquired by purchase, or even under the homestead act, was to be swept away from them and their children to satisfy the rapacity of the contractors who brought them over. Whenever the operatives in an American mine or at an American furnace became dissatisfied with their wages and struck for better pay, all that the mine or furnace owner had to do was to send his agent abroad to the densely populated, poor and squalid inhabitants of Russia, Poland, Italy, or other oppressed region, contract for laborers to take the places of the strikers, and the machinery worked smoothly again. Whole colonies of American citizens have been swept away from their places of labor in this manner. Who was it that originated a bill repealing this law? It originated in a Democratic House of Representatives. Not only was the law allowing the importation of contract laborers repealed, but an amendment was made afterwards, with the approval of President Cleveland, which made the vessel bringing them to this country liable for the expense of transporting them back, and by a clause I offered, which was adopted, if it failed to do so, prevented it from entering in or clearing from our ports. This President Ceveland made effective by his approval. I leave this House to determine which has manifested the greatest affection and which has bestowed the greatest blessing upon the laboring man in this case, the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania or the President whose message he criticises.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in order to show that I do not distort the facts of the case, I send to the Clerk's desk also to be read the testimony of the laboring men, taken before Senator BLAIR'S investigating committee, in my distinguished friend's State, showing the oppression that grew out of the act which has been read.

John Murray, of Shawnee (Ohio) Miners' Association:

"Our men are deeply interested in the bill against the importation of labor, and we expect Congress to do something to remedy the evil. There were seven hundred foreigners and seven hundred colored men brought to my district during a recent strike."

Fred Turner, of Philadelphia, Pa., secretary of the Knights of Labor, said:

"It is the universal sentiment that the bill of Mr. FORAN should be passed. The importation of foreign workmen is getting as bad as that of the Chinese. We have not the slightest objection to their voluntary coming. The African slave was better off than are these people under some of these contracts. The slave had some one to look after his welfare; these people have not. We present a petition to the committee containing 35,000 names of persons who pray for relief by the passage of a bill to remedy this matter."

Mr. Chairman, there is another gentleman whom I wish to quote to show the importance of tariff reduction. At a time when there was not one tithe the necessity or demand for tariff reduction that there is to-day, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] made a speech, in the Forty-seventh Congress, in which he used the following language, and made use of the following strong arguments in favor of a reduction in taxation; this, too, when we had outstanding, subject to the call of the Government, over $400,000,000 of bonds, and when the surplus was less than now:

It is equally true that excessive taxation, even when it is successful in securing revenue, is ultimately destructive of the sources of labor from which it is drawn, while at the same time it engenders extravagance, corruption, and decay. For when the Government sets the example of extravagance it is soon followed in every walk of life, and one does not need to be a prophet to foretell the general ruin which must inevitably result. Frugality and economy never destroyed any government, while they have built up the most powerful empires the world has ever witnessed.

And again in the same speech he says:

The existing overflowing Treasury brings a demand for reduction of the tariff and internal-revenue taxes. In my opinion, in such a condition of our finances reduction of taxation should at once begin. Unnecessary taxation is injurious to the interests of the people in many directions. Government has no justification for the collection of burdensome taxes in excess of the sum requisite for the support of its proper administration. What have we seen in this Congress? The excess of our resources has induced the presentation of every conceivable scheme to deplete the Treasury, and our expenditures, unless checked in time, will reach enormous proportions and bring back again, as prior to 1874, a saturnalia of extravagance and disgrace.

Your committee have done the very things that it was stated then were necessary to be done. They have prepared a bill for the reduction of internal-revenue and tariff taxes. Every bond that was subject to the call of the Government when that speech was made has been paid. Every dollar of indebtedness which can be discharged without the payment of a high premium has been extinguished; vast accumulations have been piled up in the Treasury until its vaults are fairly bursting with money which ought to be in the channels of trade, till there is about $150,000,000 where there was only a small surplus. This House stands ready to make good the words which he used on that occasion. It is ready to give the relief which he said the people were entitled to receive. We are ready and willing to remove the temptation to corrupt government which he said was always found in a plethoric Treasury. We are ready to aid him in insuring to the people that "frugality and economy" which he said never "destroyed any government," and to prevent that "saturnalia of extravagance and disgrace" which he said characterized the period just anterior to 1874.

CONSUMER PAYS TARIFF TAXES.

It is insisted by some protectionists that the foreign manufacturer pays the taxes which are collected from imports. A greater fallacy was never attempted to be palmed off on the people. When goods reach the custom-house the importer pays the tariff dues; he then sells to the retail dealer for the original cost, the insurance, tariffs, and his commissions added. Upon all of these the retail dealer adds a per cent. to pay him for dealing in the goods, and with this per cent. added upon the tariff cost he sells to the consumer, who in the end pays every dollar, both of the original cost, insurance, tariffs, and the profits of the two dealers through whose hands they pass added. The tariff duties, therefore, increase by so much the price at which the consumer buys them. There would be more comfort in the transaction if the Government got the benefit of all the costs thus added. But it is estimated that for every dollar that is paid into the Treasury on imported goods there is paid to the manufacturers of this country five; so that the tariff taxation costs not only what is paid into the custom-house, but the incidental increase of expense upon all, or a greater part, of the dutiable goods made and consumed in the United States.

The lowest estimate that can possibly be placed upon this increased cost of commodities to the people is hundreds of millions of dollars. I would like for some man versed in constitutional law to tell me under what clause of the Constitution a tax can be legally placed upon the people for any other purpose than the necessities of government. I would also be exceedingly gratified to have any man, be he constitutional lawyer or not, explain where is the justice in requiring one man to contribute a tax to make another man's vocation pay.

The following table will show what the increased cost added to these classes of articles of domestic manufacture has been by reason of the high tariff in one year:

Articles.	Imports, 1887.	Duties.	Domestic manufactures.	Cost added by tariff.
Iron	$50,618,985	$20,713,233	$296,557,685	$85,000,000
Cotton	29,150,058	11,710,719	192,060,110	55,000,000
Wool	44,235,243	29,729,717	267,252,913	107,000,000
Total cost added by tariff				247,000,000

The following, taken from the Million, further illustrates the cost to the people. I should state, however, that I have not had time to verify the calculations made:

In default of information by Government efforts have been made by experts to make approximate calculations of the cost of protection. The average of such estimates is about $750,000,000 per annum. Some estimates exceed a billion; few are so low as half a billion dollars a year. Perhaps the most elaborate and one of the most careful and detailed estimates places the annual cost at $556,000,000. We shall assume this as approximately correct, though far below the average calculation.

For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, the dutiable imports were $433,000,000 and the duties about $194,500,000, or nearly 45 per cent. of such imports.

The domestic production of dutiable goods exceeds the imports five or six times. We know that the manufacturers of dutiable goods, like all other men, get as high prices for their goods as they can. If the duty be added to the price, as some contend, then the figures would stand thus:

Domestic product of dutiable goods	$2,440,000,000
Enhanced price at 45 per cent., nearly	1,100,000,000

Suppose the enhanced price, however, to be half the duty. This would give the aggregate of $550,000,000.

In this calculation, however, as in most of the calculations, an important element has been omitted, namely: waste—the waste produced by misdirecting industry from natural channels into artificial. Few calculations lay proper stress on this very important element of price. In the cost of "protection" must be counted not only the enhanced cost of the artificial products forced, but also of the natural products neglected, the price of which is thereby enhanced. In a word, protection is a two-edged sword, working disastrously on the whole range of prices.

Can any one doubt that a half billion a year thrown in to derange the natural channels of industry will affect that industry? Can any one doubt that a duty of about 45 per cent.—equal to three or four profits—will draw people into artificial industries, to the detriment of the natural?

Suppose the effect on dutiable goods to be half the duty, say $550,000,000, and the enhanced price on the neglected goods to be half as great as the above, say $275,000,000, we should have as the cost of protection an aggregate of $825,000,000.

But for our present purposes we shall omit the element of waste and take for comparison one of the lowest estimates of the enhanced price of dutiable goods only.

On this view compare the cost of "incidental protection" with other big things:

Cost of all the State and Territorial governments combined	$52,000,000
Ten times their combined cost	520,000,000
Cost of protection	550,000,000

Excess of cost of protection over ten times the combined cost of all the State and Territorial governments, $30,000,000 per annum.

Take another view:

Cost of the Federal Government	$400,000,000
Cost of all the State governments	52,000,000
Cost of all the county governments	70,000,000
Total	522,000,000
Cost of protection	550,000,000
Leaving	28,000,000

as the excess of the cost of protection over the cost of all the governments of the Union, the States, the Territories, and the counties.

One other view only. The tariff yielded—

To Government	$194,500,000
To protection	550,000,000
Excess	355,500,000

Protection gets $355,000,000 more than Government gets. Double what the tariff yields, and we have $389,000,000. And so protection gets $161,000,000 more than twice as much as Government.

The following table, prepared with great care by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], shows these incidental expenses in detail:

Statement showing the amount of incidental taxes annually imposed on the people of the United States in the increased cost of home products by reason of discriminating duties on imported articles of like character, together with the value of such home products, the amount of wages paid and number of hands employed, and the imports and duties received thereon for the year 1882.

DESTRUCTION OF AMERICAN SHIPPING.

Mr. Chairman, there is another thing to which I wish to call attention in passing to show the calamitous results which have followed this repressive policy. Under the rule of this Government before we attempted to exclude everything from our markets and forced the people to buy in the dearest markets, we had commerce carried on in American ships with all the nations of the earth. The American seaman was found in every port, the American vessel breasted the waves of all waters, and the American flag floated over the mastheads of hundreds of ships and thousands of seamen. We had conquered the lands and triumphed on the sea, and asked no people on earth to carry our commerce for us; but instead were engaged in successful rivalry in carrying on commerce between the other nations of the world. Glory, honor, and empire were ours. But what is the situation to-day? The Secretary of the Treasury has stated it tersely in the following passage from his report:

> Thus it will be seen that our foreign commerce, carried in vessels of the United States, measured by its value, has steadily declined from 75 per cent. in 1856 to less than 14 per cent. in 1887. Even of this small percentage less than one-half was carried in steam-vessels bearing our flag.
> A citizen of the United States may buy a foreign-built vessel in a foreign port; he may put the United States flag upon it and trade with all the countries of the world except his own. Our Government will protect him with all its power in such trade; but if he brings his ship with our flag upon it to one of our ports, our Government will confiscate it or impose prohibitory duties. He may, however, put the flag of any other country on that same ship and bring it to his home without molestation by our Government; it is then protected by the power of a foreign country. It is difficult to understand why it would not be well to so change our navigation laws as to allow foreign-built ships owned by our citizens to come and go between this and other countries while bearing the flag of the country of their owners.

We have absolutely driven our carrying trade from our own people. Pretending to protect, we have done nothing but destroy; pretending to assist, we have only crushed our seafaring industry; pretending to be a friend of the American merchant marine, we have been its worst and deadliest enemy, and to-day we carry but 13 per cent. of our foreign commerce and pay millions to others to do our work for us; and yet gentlemen come here and propose to undo this work by subsidies out of the people's Treasury.

So extraordinary are our laws if a citizen of this Government buys a ship abroad and puts the flag of his own country on it and comes into an American port his ship is seized by the United States authorities.

Mr. DINGLEY. Will the gentleman allow me a word at this point?

Mr. MCMILLIN. I will yield to the gentleman in a moment.

Whilst the Government does this, if the same citizen buys the same vessel and puts over it any other flag than his country's, he is protected and may come into any port of this land. Where is the justice of this, where is the patriotism? For myself, I am wholly unable to see it.

I now yield to the gentleman from Maine for a question.

Mr. DINGLEY. I do not want this question of the revival of the foreign carrying trade to drift into the rut of partisan tariff or free-trade discussion——

Mr. MCMILLIN. There is no danger that it will get into any "rut" where it does not belong; but where it does belong there it shall go.

Mr. DINGLEY. We want to get at the exact facts. The gentleman has suggested that at a certain period in the past, under another tariff policy, the foreign carrying trade of the United States was 75 per cent. of our exports and imports, and that now it is only 14 per cent. I desire to suggest, because it is important in this line, that it is true that in 1855——

Mr. MCMILLIN. Does the gentleman want to ask a question?

Mr. DINGLEY. Certainly; a question right on this point.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Well, ask your question; I do not want to yield for a speech.

Mr. DINGLEY. I want to know whether it is not true that though in 1855 75½ per cent. of the carrying trade of the United States was done by American vessels, yet in 1861 the proportion had declined to 66½ per cent.—a decline of about 9 per cent. in six years; so that the decline between 1855 and 1861, under the revenue tariff of which my friend has spoken, was as great per annum as it has been at any time since the war.

Mr. MCMILLIN. What is the gentleman's question?

Mr. DINGLEY. I ask the gentleman whether he is not aware that such is the fact.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I am aware that under the laws which existed prior to 1861 we had our own ships carrying our own commerce.

Mr. DINGLEY. But the decline of our foreign carrying trade was as rapid from 1855 to 1861, under the revenue tariff of which the gentleman has spoken, as it has been since the war under the protective tariff.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I admit that there was a slight decline; but I deny that there was anything like the rot and decay that have been experienced under our present system.

Mr. DINGLEY. The decline was as rapid, year by year, six years before the war as it has been since.

Mr. MCMILLIN. That I deny. Now, "turn about is fair play." Let me ask you a question. Do you favor that policy which permits the United States to seize and confiscate the ship bought by the citizen of the United States in a foreign port, if it comes into our own ports, but at the same time protects him if he goes somewhere else, and sails under the flag of some other country? [Applause.]

Mr. DINGLEY. I favor the policy of confining American registered vessels to vessels built in this country—a policy which was inaugurated by Washington, and has continued in operation from that day until the present. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MCMILLIN. I wish to say to my friend from Maine that by his policy he declines, through the operation of statute law, to let us buy vessels abroad, and then by reason of other statutes, known as high tariff laws, puts it out of our power to build in this country for a cost that will enable our people to compete with those buying ships built elsewhere. He knows——

Mr. DINGLEY. I favor the laws with reference to the registration of American vessels that have existed from the time of Washington to the present day.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The gentleman knows that the tariff rates on materials which enter into a ship are higher now than they were before the war.

Mr. DINGLEY. They are not so far as vessels for the foreign trade are concerned, I desire to say to my friend.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Is iron no higher?

Mr. DINGLEY. I wish to say——

Mr. MCMILLIN. Is iron no higher?

Mr. DINGLEY. Let me say——

Mr. MCMILLIN. I can not yield if the gentleman declines to answer my questions after I have answered his.

Mr. DINGLEY. Taking all the materials for a vessel for the foreign trade as they——

Mr. MCMILLIN. I can not yield further to the gentleman after declining to plainly answer my question.

Mr. DINGLEY. Ah, but the gentleman asked me a question, and refuses to allow me to answer.

Mr. McMILLIN. I must decline to yield; the gentleman wants to make a speech.

Mr. DINGLEY. The gentleman must not ask questions to which he does not allow an answer. He has unlimited time——

Mr. McMILLIN. I must decline to yield.

Mr. DINGLEY. But the gentleman does not wish to give a false impression in reference to this important matter?

Mr. McMILLIN. I do not give any false impression.

Mr. DINGLEY. Let me answer.

Mr. McMILLIN. But the gentleman has declined to answer me.

Mr. DINGLEY. I have not declined.

Mr. McMILLIN. You can say if it is true or false, you know it or you do not know it. Now, is it not true that the iron which enters into the construction of a ship in this country pays a higher rate of duty?

Mr. DINGLEY. If it is of iron——

Mr. McMILLIN. I am talking of the iron which enters into the construction of ships generally.

Mr. DINGLEY. The iron which enters into the construction of a wooden ship, such as we built exclusively before the war, pays less duty than before the war.

Mr. McMILLIN. Does not the gentleman know the cost of almost everything entering into the construction of a ship in this country is greater than it is in other countries?

Mr. DINGLEY. It was before the war. So far as the materials were iron, we could not have built iron ships then any more successfully in competition with the Clyde than we can now.

Mr. McMILLIN. Is it not 33 per cent. higher?

Mr. DINGLEY. It was as much higher before the war as it is now. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. McMILLIN. Now, Mr. Chairman, the copper, the iron, the steel, and other materials which enter into the construction of a ship pay a higher rate of duty, and yet these same gentlemen complain that ship-building in this country costs more than it does in foreign countries, and a cry comes up of the decay of our merchant marine while you refuse to give any remedy.

Sad, sad to the patriotic heart is the reflection that we have so degenerated in our foreign carrying trade that when the American citizen goes to many of the ports of the world accredited as consul and desires once more to see the flag of his native land, he looks not out on the broad blue ocean! Alas, it is not there! He must turn sorrowfully into his own room, delve down into the bottom of his own trunk and get out the Stars and Stripes he carried with him.

Mr. Chairman, they propose to counteract the vicious and constricting policy which has been followed for so many years by levying taxes upon those who live inland to make the vocations of those who are engaged in the carrying trade pay. Commerce can not be restored in that way. It is futile to attempt it. So long as the American citizen can not fly the American flag on any vessel except those built in our ports—and has to pay 30 per cent. more to build his vessel than does the citizen of any other country—so long will we be laboring under a disadvantage which subsidy is inadequate to remedy. [Applause.]

LABOR.

Under what specious plea have we robbed the people, laborers and all? Under the pretense that it is for the benefit of the laboring men. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] in the opening of this discussion made some illustrations, and quoted some statistics, which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] never answered, and which the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] I predict, will not attempt to answer.

Mr. Chairman, we only have to make a few comparisons to show the utter fallacy of the claim of the protectionists that the high duties now existing were imposed or are kept for the benefit of the laboring man. I give the following table, compiled by Mr. Seaton, superintendent, from the Tenth Census, showing the value of various manufactured products in 1880 and the per cent. that the labor cost bears to the whole cost. I have also added for convenience the present and proposed tariff rates, from which it will be seen that in no instance does the committee propose on these articles a duty less than the per cent. of labor cost that is contained in them.

Table, compiled from Tenth Census, showing value of various manufactured products, per cent. of labor cost, rate of duty existing and proposed.

Industries.	Value of product.	Labor.	Percentage of labor.	Present tariff.	Proposed rate.
				Per ct.	Per ct.
Carpets	$31,792,802	$6,835,218	21.5	47	30
Cotton goods	210,950,383	45,614,419	21.6	50	40
Bolts, nuts, etc	10,073,330	1,981,300	19.7	59	35
Nails and spikes	5,629,240	1,255,171	22.3	43	34
Iron pipe, wrought	13,292,162	1,788,258	13.5	70	35
Oil, castor	653,900	44,714	6.8	194	97
Oil, linseed	15,393,812	681,677	4.4	54	21
Screws	2,184,532	456,542	20.9	50	35
Wool hats	8,516,569	1,893,215	22.2	54	40
Woolen goods	160,606,721	25,836,392	16.1	70	40
Worsted goods	33,549,942	5,683,027	16.9	68	40

It will thus be seen that while the labor in carpets, leaving off fractions, is 21 per cent. of the cost, the tariff is 47 per cent. In cotton goods the labor is the same and the tariff 50 per cent. In wrought-iron pipe, labor is 13 per cent. and the tariff 70 per cent. In castor-oil, labor 6 per cent. and the tariff 194 per cent. In wool hats, the labor is 22 per cent. and the tariff 54 per cent. In woolen goods, labor is 10 per cent. and the tariff 70 per cent. In worsted goods, labor is 16 per cent. and the tariff 68 per cent. I do not blame manufacturers and capital for wanting to form a partnership with the laboring man when such a small per cent. of all the cost is labor when compared with the rate of duty imposed.

COMPLAINTS OF THE MINORITY.

Mr. Chairman, the gentlemen who signed the minority report complain of the manner in which the bill under consideration was prepared. I hazard nothing in saying that if their wishes in this regard had been complied with, and an attempt made to do all the work in full committee at odd times when the House was not in session June would have reached us without any bill before this House; for it will be remembered that when a request was made for the committee to sit during the sessions of the House it was opposed by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS], a member of the Committee on Ways and Means. What right have they to complain? The question is not how, when, or where the bill was prepared, but what is the bill? Is it good or bad? They are in no attitude to complain in any event, because it is a well-known fact that the very gentlemen who signed the minority report in 1883 railroaded through Congress a bill which was not only never prepared by the Ways and Means Committee of the House, as is contemplated by the Constitution, but was never read in the House of Representatives. The tariff law which we now seek to amend thus became a law without the members of Congress ever having heard or read it. Hence I say they are in no attitude to criticise anybody for any method adopted in the consideration of a tariff bill.

INCONSISTENCIES OF PRESENT LAW.

Mr. Chairman, the minority complain at what they are pleased to call the inconsistencies in the bill. Let those inconsistencies be what they may, they are not a tenth nor a hundredth part of those found under the present law, which these gentlemen helped to force upon the country. Let us take a few illustrations. Woolen yarns bear a duty of 69 per cent.; the higher-priced cloths of wool bear a duty of only 68 per cent., the cheaper dress goods a duty of 67 per cent., and the higher 59 per cent., while the ready-made clothing into which the cloths are made bears a duty of only 54 per cent. Take wool; let it be scoured, carded, spun, woven, and made into cloth by the carding process, and it bears a duty ranging from 68 to 89 per cent. But take the same wool, wash it, or scour it as you did before, and comb it, so that when spun and woven it is worsted cloth, and it bears a less rate of duty than is imposed on woolens. Whoever saw a more glaring inconsistency in a tariff bill than this? Nor is this confined to woolen goods. Look to cotton goods. Colored tarlatan has a duty of 250 per cent., while ruchings, that are made therefrom, bear a duty of only 35 per cent. Come down to the metal schedule. Hoop-iron not thinner than No. 20 bears a duty of 47 per cent., while cotton-ties, made of this same hoop-iron, bear a duty of only 35 per cent. Pig-iron bears a duty of $6.72 per ton, while die-blocks, etc., made of pig-iron, bear a duty of only $6.04 per ton. In this way, and by this kind of "tinkering," almost every worsted establishment in the country claims to have been on the verge of bankruptcy since 1883, when the iniquitous tariff under which we are now living was adopted.

If these gentlemen had attempted to put a premium upon the closing up of establishments on this side of the waters and opening them on the other, they could not have been more effectual than they have been by this inconsistent, incongruous tariff which we are now trying to amend; and yet they complain that there is not consistency in the bill which we present. There is another fault to be found with the present tariff law which we have striven to remedy by the bill which we present for your adoption. In almost every schedule of the present law it will be observed that the coarser the goods and the more likely they are to be worn or used by those in the humbler walks of life the higher the rate of duty fixed upon them; and the converse, of course, follows, that the more luxuriant the article the lower the rate of duty. We have attempted in the tariff which we present for your adoption to so frame it that the tax would bear most heavily upon luxuries and those things without which the people can live, rather than upon the necessaries of life. Hence we have reduced the tariff on the metal schedule, but have not lowered it on jewelry; we have reduced it on woolen goods, and have not lowered it on silks; and we have reduced it on sugar and taken it off of salt, but have not made one farthing of reduction on liquors, wines, etc.

Sir, there is an objection to our economic training of the day that may be justly urged. That is, the tendency to inculcate in the people concerning tariffs and almost everything else a desire for paternal government. We are striving to teach our people concerning tariffs and almost everything else that they can not prosper in their business pursuits without they are fortified by United States statutes; we are trying to inculcate in them the belief that upon Congress depends the amount of their wages, the number of hours which they shall labor and their prosperity or adversity in their industrial pursuits. There never yet was an assemblage of lawmakers wise enough to devise laws which should control and regulate these things with perfect satisfaction to all. They must be left to their own best regulation. They are controlled best when they are controlled least. What is the result of this teaching? When you teach the people to look to government to do this you teach them to look for that in which they must inevitably be disappointed; and when the disappointment comes, believing that government is to blame for all the calamities that overtook them, they first become dissatisfied with it, then get to be lukewarm toward it, and may finally hate it.

Woe will betide the day when the laboring people of the United States come to believe that Congress, and it alone, can give them prosperity or adversity in their industrial pursuits. It is better to follow the old doctrine of the fathers, to protect the citizen in his life, his liberty, and his pursuit of happiness, and leave him to do the balance unhampered by legislative restraint and undeluded by demagogic flattery and folly. I now and then am most profoundly disgusted by hearing some man, while sawing the air with his hands and splitting the ears of the groundlings with his tongue, proclaim that the American citizen can not stand the least competition with the men of other countries. I am an American born, and an American by instinct, and an American in all my affections, and I am never going to do the people of the United States the injustice to suppose that God ever created a race of human beings on this earth who can successfully put down the American citizen in his race for supremacy in all that is right. [Applause.] I do not believe it now; I never will believe it until I shall have seen it tried and demonstrated that I am wrong; and he does himself injustice, he does his sires injustice and his sons injustice, who holds to the doctrine that we are a generation of pygmies to be overridden by other people without we have Congressional legislation to aid us.

Sir, protectionists are peculiarly unfortunate in the different arguments to which they resort to accomplish the same end. With seemingly bland simplicity, they tell the workman that he wants protection in order to give him higher wages. They turn round and in the same breath tell the citizen who pays these taxes that he wants protection for the purpose of giving him cheaper clothes; for, they say, "home competition inevitably does this." They tell the manufacturer he wants it to give him greater profits. How the same law is going to give cheaper clothes to the poor man, higher wages to the laboring man, and greater profit to the manufacturer they do not deign to show. But it is not for the laboring man that this claim is really made; it is not for the man who pays the taxes that it is made; but it is corporate capital disguised as the "friend of the laboring man and the taxpayer" that is making this argument. It will not be denied by any that we have the most fruitful and fertile soil, combined with the most genial climate in the world. We have, taken as a class, the most industrious people and the highest inventive genius in the world. There is no country on the earth that takes so few of its young men from the industrial callings to go into the military and naval service as does ours. These things being so, is the day not at hand or fast approaching when all of this energy, this inventive genius, this freedom to work in industrial pursuits, will not be satisfied or prosperous in simply making what it can eat and wear?

EXTEND OUR MARKETS.

No, sir, we must have other and broader markets. I say to-day to those living on the coasts that to them will first come the calamities of a restricted market. In the early history of the country our large cities were stretched along the coast, and those in the interior labored under great disadvantages. But railroads have changed our commerce, and just inside of this line of border cities have sprung up other cities which are as prosperous and promising as those on the seacoast. They are rapidly taking the trade from the seacoast, and those who live upon the outskirts will soon find their only refuge from decay will be upon the broad ocean, and there they will have to turn. They can not always beat down their neighbors in their own markets. They have to get out in the world or go down in the conflict. The time will come when New England will not be able to buy cotton in the South, manufacture it 1,200 miles away, pay two transportations, and sell it in competition with mills running beside the cotton-fields.

Sir, take my own State as an illustration. We are far in the interior. Originally we were a fine market for the products of Pennsylvania and the Eastern manufactures, but to-day we are doing much of our own manufacturing. Instead of going abroad for commodities we are sending them abroad. We are sending our marble from ocean to ocean; we are shipping our coke hundreds of miles; our iron carried through Pittsburgh is being sold as far east as Boston, and the generation is now here that will behold the auctioneer from Alabama and Tennessee standing upon the custom-house steps of the city of Pittsburgh auctioning off pig-iron in sight of furnaces from which the smoke is no longer curling.

Mr. Chairman, I hold in my hand a piece of steel made by the Henderson process at Birmingham, Ala., out of our Southern iron, high in phosphorus, at a cost, as the president of the works tells me, of $18 a ton. American pluck, energy, and inventive genius again triumphant!

Mr. WHEELER. And the phosphorus in the iron will almost pay for making the steel. [Applause.]

Mr. McMILLIN. Yes, I am told so.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. McMILLIN. Yes, for a question, but not for a speech.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. We have no objection to the auctioneer going from Alabama and Tennessee; but we do object to his going from England or some other country to Tennessee. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. McMILLIN. Fret not yourself. He can never come South, I assure you.

I regretted to hear the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania speak of the fact we have not further developed in the South. I do not recur to the past for any purpose, except for the lesson of wisdom which it teaches. God forbid that in my heart there should be found a corner deep enough or dark enough to wish misfortune to any quarter of this glorious country. [Applause.] I am for every foot of it, wherever that glorious flag floats [pointing to the flag over the Speaker's desk] or our eagle soars. [Prolonged applause.] Sir, in contemplating what has already been done there, I am not surprised that we have done so little, but I am astonished we have done so much. When the war closed we had eleven millions of people in the South. And of the eleven millions, the combined wealth of six millions of them above indebtedness would not have bought one suit of clothes. To-day we stand triumphant over misfortune. I recur to this not to criticise any, but to rejoice with all. [Applause.]

On the gloomy outlook for

NEW ENGLAND MANUFACTURES

I quote from a gentleman who lives in New England, a very distinguished diplomat under the last administration—I mean the Hon. James Russell Lowell. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] He was a diplomat and the representative of your administration accredited to the Court of St. James. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. KELLEY. Benedict Arnold was a major-general in the Continental Army. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. McMILLIN. My friend from Pennsylvania has shown by his interruption and speech that he lives in the past and the past only.

Mr. KELLEY. Yes; and you will, too, when you get to be as old as I am. [Applause.]

Mr. McMILLIN. My sincere hope is that the gentleman's years may be lengthened out for many summers yet. [Applause.]

I send to the Clerk's desk to be read an extract from a speech made in New York on the 13th instant by Mr. Lowell, whose name has aroused so much ire on the other side of the Chamber.

The Clerk read as follows:

All that reasonable men contend for now is the reduction of the tariff in such a way as shall be least hurtful to existing interests, most helpful to the consumer, and, above all, as shall practically test the question whether we are better off when we get our raw material at the lowest possible prices. I think the advocates of protection have been unwise, and are beginning to see that they are unwise in shifting the ground of debate. They have set many people to asking whether robbing Peter to pay Paul is a method equally economical for both parties, and whether the bad policy of it be not all the more flagrant in proportion as the Peters are many and the Pauls few? Whether the Pauls of every variety be not inevitably forced into an alliance offensive and defensive against the Peters? Whether if we are taxed for the payment of a bounty to the owner of a silver mine we should not be equally taxed to make a present to the owner of wheat fields, cotton fields, tobacco fields, which are the most productive gold mines of this country? Whether the case of protection is not like that of armored ships, requiring ever thicker plating as the artillery of competition is perfected?

I confess I can not take a cheerful view of the future of that New England I love so well, when her leading industries shall be gradually drawn to the South, as they infallibly will be, by the great cheapness of labor there. It is not pleasant to hear that called the American system which has succeeded in abolishing our foreign commerce. It is even less pleasant to hear it advocated as being for the interest of the laborer by men who imported cheap labor till it was forbidden by law. That protection has been the cause of our material prosperity is refuted by the passage I have quoted from Burke.

* * * * * * * *

Of the surplus in the Treasury I will only say that it has already shown itself to be an incitement to every possible variety of wasteful expenditure, and, therefore, of demoralizing jobbery, and that it has again revived that theory of grandmotherly government which is most hostile to the genius of our institutions, and which soonest saps the energy and corrodes the morals of the people.

Mr. McMILLIN. Lest I should forget it let me now answer another of the positions taken, upon which the gentleman from Pennsylvania laid great stress in his speech a few days ago. It will be remembered that he stated that by indirection the committee had placed iron ore and coal on the free-list. That is absolutely without any just foundation. It was not the purpose of the committee to do it, it did not attempt to do it, and has not done it.

Mr. KELLEY. Well, that is a difference of opinion.

Mr. McMILLIN. A difference of opinion. Yes, and I will put the statement of the case before the House in such a light that there can be no honest difference of opinion upon it.

I read from the present law:

Iron ore, including manganiferous iron ore, also the dross or residuum from burnt pyrites, 75 cents per ton.

This the committee has left untouched.

Under another section the following is found, which was made free by us:

Mineral substances in a crude state and metals unwrought, not specially enumerated or provided for in this act, 20 per cent. ad valorem.

Now, it will be remembered that those things which we did not touch in that law are left as the law now provides. That is the basis on which the bill is framed and upon which we expect it to be sustained.

Mr. O'FERRALL. I understood the gentleman to state that it was not the intention of the Ways and Means Committee to affect the present tariff on iron ore, manufactured iron, and coal.

Mr. McMILLIN. I had reference to iron ore and coal in my remarks. Some manufactured irons are reduced, but not ore or coal.

Mr. O'FERRALL. Then with reference to iron ore and coal. Will the gentleman answer this question in that connection: If it shall be determined upon an examination of the bill that there is any uncertainty upon that question, is the committee willing to so amend the bill as to remove all uncertainity?

Mr. McMILLIN. Not only willing, but we will do it. It was never intended to do anything different from that. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has not taken in the full scope of the situation, I think. He will remember that under existing law there were two classifications of ore, the one which I read and this one which he says has the effect to let in free coal and ore.

Mr. KELLEY. In connection with two other clauses.

Mr. McMILLIN. I will read the law, because I propose to lay the whole question before the House exactly as it is:

Mineral substances in a crude state, and metals unwrought, not specially enumerated or provided for in this act, 20 per cent. ad valorem.

That is the present law. Now, we changed that; but the other clause quoted was not touched. But it will be noticed that we made the change—

Mineral substance in a crude state, and metals unwrought, not specially enumerated or provided for—

Are placed upon the free-list. We left out the words "in this act," so that it does not affect the other classification, and to prevent it from doing so.

Mr. BAYNE. But what do you make of the proposition on page 59, where it provides:

And all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with the other requirements and provisions of this act are also hereby repealed.

Mr. McMILLIN. My friend will remember we only affect those things named in the bill, and the provision relating to iron-ore is not named—therefore is not affected by the bill, therefore not inconsistent with the bill, and therefore not repealed by the clause he cites.

Why, my friend will bear witness that we do not touch the duty on jewelry, for instance, in this bill; and yet it would not be claimed that that provision he has cited would have reference to jewelry and put it on the free-list. We do not touch wines or liquors, and they can not be claimed to be on the free-list. We do not touch the silk schedules, and yet they are left right where they were. And so I might go on through the bill. Many luxuries we have not lowered, and they remain as in the existing law, notwithstanding the repealing clause read by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE]. This is an amendment to existing law, and therefore the classification in the existing law remains unless specifically amended or altered by this bill.

Mr. BAYNE. I think this does more than that.

Mr. McMILLIN. Well, the gentleman can explain it in his own time, I can not consent to detain the House longer on this point.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. McMILLIN. I regret very much to have to decline, but I have detained the House too long——

Mr. CANNON. I only wanted to ask, if the gentleman is in favor of cheap heat for the people why not put coal on the free-list, and also, if in favor of free raw material, why not put iron ore there?

Mr. McMILLIN. Ah! there are some things you can do and some things you can not. [Laughter.] But, to be serious, I will state to the gentleman from Illinois that our iron ore and our coal are so universally distributed that it can not be claimed that it would make a farthing's difference in the cost of these commodities to the people if they were made free.

Mr. CANNON. Well, that is an astonishing admission on the part of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. MILLIKEN. You touch manufactured iron, however.

Mr. McMILLIN. We tried to give the relief to the people that they needed as far as it was in our power to aid them, and did lower duties on many iron products.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Then if you do that you would put iron and coal on the free-list. You fail to reduce the raw material but you reduce the manufactured material.

Mr. McMILLIN. We reduce in some cases, not in others. We made no reduction that we believed would interfere with or destroy the industries of the people.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Will the gentleman allow me again?

Mr. McMILLIN. I can not trespass upon the time of the House much longer. I have now spoken nearly two hours, and although the House has been very kind to me I must not abuse its favor. More than $10,000 of surplus has gone into the Treasury while I have been speaking, to be locked up, and we must hasten on.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I am sorry. I hope $10,000 more will go. I always like to listen to the gentleman.

Mr. McMILLIN. I thank my friend for his compliment.

TRUSTS AND POOLS.

Sir, let that deluded statesman who believes that the high duties which we have thrown around our country can ever insure to the people low prices for commodities behold the situation to-day. For years we have had these halls ringing with statements that by and by home competition would give us the lowest possible prices. The welkin has been made to ring with this declaration iterated and reiterated, until even those who first proclaimed it have almost gotten to believe it. But look at our unfortunate situation and let this delusion be dispelled. While the Government has thrown up its tariff walls without, monopolists have joined hands within for the purpose of putting up prices and plundering the people through the devices known as trusts, pools, and combines.

Mr. FORAN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him how under this bill it is possible to prevent the formation of trusts either in this or in other countries?

Mr. McMILLIN. I am glad my friend asked that question. It is easy of elucidation. You can not absolutely prevent the formation of the trusts, but you make it vastly more difficult for them to control as you extend the area over which they are to operate.

Mr. FORAN. Another question. Is it not true that the only remedy for trusts is competition?

Mr. McMILLIN. Why, competition does not amount to a straw when they get together and determine with each other that they will not compete, and that they will close up every new establishment that starts and refuses to join the trust.

Mr. Chairman, we have the steel-rail trust, which cost the people of this country last year millions of dollars. It is not a trust to increase production, but to restrict it; it is not a trust to give cheaper commodities to the people, but to put bigger profits into the pockets of the monopolists. It has closed furnaces that were successfully running; it has, aided by the tariff, increased by more than $1,000 the cost of every mile of railroad built in the United States for the last five years; it has thrown men out of employment and broken up the means of living of thousands of workingmen. Why, even the existence of this trust has been denied; but listen to this quotation from the Bulletin of the American Iron and Steel Association, a paper printed in the interests of the iron and steel producers of the United States, and at their cost.

Under the head "American iron market for steel rails" we find the following:

STEEL RAILS.

One of the makers reports sales during the week aggregating 6,000 tons. Outside of this no transactions whatever are reported, and the market is extremely dull both East and West. The board of control has decided upon an increase in the allotment of 200,000 tons, which will relieve the pressure on some of the Eastern mills.

It would seem from this very business-like statement that the "board of control" is not misnamed, and absolutely controls the output of steel rails in this country. It determines when it shall be increased and when restricted, being careful only to maintain prices up to the cost of foreign goods with the duty added.

Have the gentlemen of the minority proposed anything better? Have they framed a bill to be adopted in lieu of ours? Have they told the House and the country what remedy they recommend for the evils which all admit to be upon us? No, sir. They are mute as to a remedy; they are dumb as to relief.

I tell them that policy will never win with a tax-ridden, a monopoly-oppressed people, a people weighed down by a trust, a pool, a combine-bound people. This is not a do-nothing occasion. Ours is not a do-nothing people. I have no fear, Mr. Chairman, concerning the ultimate result of this conflict between the people and the "pool." I have no fear as to the outcome in the contest between the country and the combine. I have no apprehension as to who will be victor in the battle about to be waged between legitimate taxation and that oppressive taxation which is invoked to aid trusts and make pooling profitable. The people have waited long and patiently. But at last they are aroused. Their voice comes thundering through these halls demanding reduction of taxes. "Justice has had to travel with a leaden heel, but is ready to strike with an iron hand." The procession for the relief of the tax-payer is moving. There are but two places about this procession—one after it, the other under it. Seek to-day, sirs, whether you prefer to follow and aid it, or go down under it and be crushed by it. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. BURROWS rose.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to ask the gentleman from Michigan to yield to me five or ten minutes that I may refer to the act of the 4th of July, 1864, and ask that a portion of my speech in favor of the bill to prohibit contract labor may appear in the RECORD to-morrow morning. I think five minutes will be sufficient for my purpose.

The act of 4th of July, 1864, was an act of humanity to restrain a custom that had prevailed in colonial days. I grew up among people who were brought from Germany under contract and were known to everybody as Redemptioners, because they had been sold to pay the expenses of the passage. Every gentleman from Pennsylvania will confirm the correctness of this statement.

On the 4th of July, 1864, we were engaged in a contest with the Democratic party; it was behaving in a very unruly and obstreperous manner. It had arms in its hands, and its suppression was depleting our mines and factories of labor.

Mr. O'NEALL, of Indiana. I rise to a question of privilege.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. O'NEALL, of Indiana. I regret to disturb the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but I ask if he is not out of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan has yielded to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Is it out of order to refer to the facts of history in this House?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is entitled to the floor.

Mr. KELLEY. We were importing labor from every country from which we could get it to keep our machinery going and send our citizens down to conquer the Democracy.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. KELLEY. I will if you get my time extended.

Mr. McMILLIN. I can not promise that. But I ask the gentleman, if that was his object why did he not repeal such a law at that time? Why did he keep it until twenty years afterwards?

Mr. KELLEY. Oh, hold your horses. The act repealed itself when Johnny came marching home and went at once to work in mine, furnace, or factory. We put a check upon that work by passing an act which authorized the President to appoint a commissioner, who should supervise the steamships and prevent the cruelty of which immigrants complained, and who should see that they should make no contract that should bind them for more than twelve months.

It was an act in defense of labor as well as of the unity and honor of the country. Here it is on page 386 of the United States Statutes at Large, volume 13. Gentlemen may read it for themselves. President Arthur signed the bill repealing the contract law.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the gentleman pardon me for reminding him that the repealing clause, which made it effective by requiring ships to carry back immigrants free of charge and prohibiting them from ever again entering our ports, was signed by President Cleveland?

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman is referring to the anti-Chinese legislation. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FORAN] had a bill which was under discussion on June 19, 1884, to prohibit contract labor. I was not on the committee that reported the bill. But the floor was yielded to me in my own right, and I give as a part of my remarks what I said on that occasion:

I have, Mr. Speaker, heard the word "socialism" whispered around me, and as loudly on the other side of the House when I went over to hear more clearly what the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FORAN] was saying. Sir, when the lawmakers of the United States, national, State, and municipal, shall fail to regard and provide for the social well-being of the laboring classes, there will be an end to enlightened republican institutions, and instead of property being made safe by the sympathies of intelligent and aspiring laborers dwelling around the capitalists and property-owners, you will, by the importation of cheap labor in the persons of the worst classes of the least enlightened states of Europe, convert every industrial center into a nest of vipers and ferocious wild beasts. There is no law of nature that will exclude all the horrors which characterized the outbreak of 1793 and the French Revolution from any part of American soil when the masses of the American people shall have been degraded to the condition in which the French toilers then were.

The safety of capital and of enterprise in this country is not found in a standing army, for we have none. It is not found in armed police, coextensive with the country, or even with our great industrial centers, for we have it not, and we have not the means of providing such protective agencies. Our Army, for the protection of order and social well-being, is found in well-housed, sufficiently fed, reasonably well educated, hopeful, and aspiring working people; and while we maintain these conditions we shall continue to demonstrate to the world that that government is strongest and most secure which relies most confidently upon the affection and confidence of its people, without armed or other organized restraint.

In so far, sir, as to demand the best possible social conditions for our laborers I declare myself to be a socialist. Though born to comparative affluence, I learned in early childhood the hardships of the work-shop. I knew what it was to work for what were then good wages for a very young copy-reader—I speak of nearly sixty years ago—a dollar a week, and to find my way part of the year to the place of my labor by the light of oil lamps furnished by the municipality, knowing that my day's work would be done only when the clock struck 8. Somewhat later than this, when I had been apprenticed, my indenture calling for one quarter's schooling in each year, I learned that when 8 o'clock had come and freed me from labor I could make my way to the night school if it had not adjourned. But, sir, looking back upon that period, I see that there was in it a safeguard which does not exist in these times. During my long apprenticeship, running on well into the seventh year, my master's home was my home.

When he and his wife and children ate their meal my seat was with them at the table. When I suffered from sickness their family physician attended me, and almost maternal and paternal care watched over my recovery. There was sympathy between labor and its employers in those days. To borrow a phrase from the cynic Carlyle, there were other relations than those of shillings and pence and hours of work and pay-day between capital and labor.

Changes have come, inevitable upon scientific discoveries, and the invention of man-superseding machinery, for that is the true way of defining labor-saving machinery. The labor which it saves to capital is the labor of men, often skilled men, and every labor-saving machine is a man-superseding machine, unless it be to supersede the labor of what is becoming too much the rival to the labor of man, that of women and children.

I am not advocating this crude bill. I am making good the impulse that induced me to thank the committee that brought the subject to our attention, and that has given us a bill that may be amended into a competent one.

I have looked upon the misery of the British, French, Belgian, German, and Austrian laborer. I tried during the tariff debate to depict the suffering of some of them. I was told when I did so that all the ills I had pointed to could be found in this country.

I painfully admit that specimens of them all can be found in this country. The only answer I can make is that they are not general here as they are elsewhere. They are merely seminal here; there they are in full fruition; there they are not only germinal, but you will find them blooming everywhere you find population at all condensed.

It is our duty to guard against their spread while we may. Let us avail ourselves of every means by which we may inspire with hope and ambition the poor foreigners who have come to our shores or have been thrust upon them by speculating contractors and have drifted into the tenement houses and cellars of New York and elsewhere. Do not let us permit avarice to add to their numbers. Do not let us gratify the greed of Pole, Italian, or Slav by welcoming to the ranks of our laborers men and women from the worst associations of Eastern and Southern Europe. Do not let us permit grasping capitalists, whether making glass, or coke, or iron, or any other product, to herd together men and women who seem to be without a clear recognition of social or moral distinctions between the sexes, if we may judge from their daily life and the manner in which they inhabit indiscriminately their large but unfurnished sleeping apartments.

Can we prohibit such immigration? We have the general-welfare clause put at us every now and again. And should I fail to find the power elsewhere in the Constitution, I would invoke the general-welfare clause in behalf of the laborers of the country.

General welfare? Shall we not under that clause protect the entire estate of millions of good men and true? For what is our Army but to drive back Indian and other invaders of our frontiers, and to thus protect the property of citizens, to re-establish order when riot breaks forth; in short, to care for the general welfare when it is threatened?

When the great Bonaparte found himself lawmaker, not only for France, but for a large part of continental Europe, he told the savans and legislators that a new form of property had come into existence, and that they must care for it as they had cared for capital invested in land or other possessions. That new form of property was labor. Sir, what is the laborer's estate? It is the skill he has acquired in an "art, trade, or mystery," as the old-fashioned indenture of apprenticeship had it. It is the force of his will and the power of his thews and sinews. It is the education he has gathered in our public schools or elsewhere. It is his ability to convert one or several things into another thing or others, and thus to add to the convenience of the citizen and the wealth of the country. These constitute his estate, and if we allow traitors at home and invading hordes from abroad to rob him of this, we fail to regard the social condition of our masses and permit them to be despoiled of their estate.

I have no difficulty and shall have none in finding arguments enough to support a well-matured bill which shall propose to accomplish the objects indicated in this one. I have said that the want and suffering and the vice and crime extreme poverty engenders are simply more rare in this country than in others. But with the present scale of importing laborers, with the eagerness which we display for cheap goods and our willingness to reduce the wages of labor in order to get cheap goods, combined with causes which can not be controlled, we are inviting the woes that attach to labor abroad and will inevitably have a development of them in this country more rapid than has occurred in Europe.

The disparity between our very rich and very poor people is wider than that in other lands. England has no man whose possessions will compare with those of several citizens of New York. We do not know what the possessions of our people are. A newly-discovered mine, a new application of science, or an invention often makes a millionaire. We have had some specimens of the influence such men may exert recently reported through the police papers, and the reports of divorce courts of the gross sensuality in which some of our millionaires spend their time and money; that many of the papers from one end of the country to the other have gratified the vanity of an old debauchee by reporting his own testimony as to bestialities with dependent women that might shame a savage is my justification for alluding to this aspect of the question. When such fortunes as are now aggregating in this country come into the hands of such beings as the vulgar dotard who has sought this unsavory notoriety it is no wonder that as his millions aggregate, the poor about him, if they do not starve, live in hopeless poverty. Yes, sir; the aggregations of capital are greater and more sudden here than abroad, and we all know the power of wealth when dealing with masses of hungry laborers.

Again, sir, women and children are more rapidly engrossing our skilled labor than they are in other lands. While I have much to say against the British Government, I have, thank God, this to say in her behalf, that in the last few years she has permitted no more women or girls to go into coal or iron mines, and has greatly reduced the number of females employed at the mouth of the coal-pits and on trains that carry coal. And what is more, she keeps, under the superintendence of the metropolitan school board, a corps of inspectors who will permit no boy or girl under fourteen years of age who has not passed the fifth standard in a public school to work an hour for wages in any shop or factory. We have no such wise provisions as these. Sir, our machinery (which, as I said, is man-superseding) increases more rapidly than that of any other land. Almost all their machinery abroad, outside of the textile industries, is either ours in fact or made under our patents. So that if Congress and the State Legislatures be not quick to check the downward progress of our laboring classes they may find it too late to do it "decently and in order."

I ask permission to print my remarks at length in to-morrow's RECORD in response to the aspersions of the gentleman from Tennessee. I will add that it was Mr. Arthur and not Mr. Cleveland who signed that law.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the gentleman from Pennsylvania will have leave to print in the RECORD the remarks to which he has referred.

There was no objection.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Chairman, It costs something to maintain a Government for 60,000,000 of people. The Secretary of the Treasury estimates that it will require $326,530,000 to meet the probable obligations of the Government during the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1888, and ending June 30, 1889. These liabilities must be discharged. The anticipated income of the Government for the same period from sources other than taxation is as follows:

From sales of public lands	$10,000,000.00
From national banks	2,000,000.00
From interest and sinking fund, Pacific railways	2,000,000.00
From customs fees, fines, penalties, &c	1,150,000.00
From fees consular, letters patent, and lands	3,500,000.00
From sales of public property	500,000.00
From profits on coinage, assays, &c	9,000,000.00
From deposits for surveying public lands	150,000.00
From revenues of the District of Columbia	2,400,000.00
From miscellaneous sources	4,500,000.00
Aggregating the sum of only	35,000,000.00

Deducting this amount from the estimated needs of the Government and there will remain $291,530,000 to be provided for. There are but two ways of raising this sum—one by a loan, the other by taxation. A proposition to borrow in times of peace and reasonable prosperity would excite universal derision. Taxation therefore is the only legitimate recourse. But this is already provided for by law. The Secretary of the Treasury estimates that at the present rate of taxation there will flow into the Treasury of the United States during the next fiscal year from—

Internal revenue sources	$120,000,000
Customs	228,000,000
Aggregating the sum of	348,000,000

an amount in excess of the estimated needs of the Government of $56,470,000. Fifty-six millions and a half in round numbers, therefore, measures the surplus which will be accumulated in the Treasury during the next fiscal year if the present rate of taxation be continued and the appropriations for governmental expenses shall equal the estimates of the Secretary. It is probable, however, that the full sum of $326,530,000 will not be appropriated. If the estimates of the Secretary for the next fiscal year are cut to the basis of expenditures for the current year, namely, three hundred and nine millions and a half, the surplus in the Treasury will be increased to seventy-three millions and a half.

Seventy-five millions, therefore, is the fullest measure of the surplus which will be accumulated in the Treasury during the next fiscal year at the present rate of taxation and expenditures. It must be borne in mind, however, that this estimate is based upon the assumption that the Democratic party is to take no thought of the Republic beyond its absolute needs. There is to be no provision for growth, for advancement, for the uplifting of the nation. Our 10,000 miles of seacoast exposed to foreign assault are to remain defenseless. Our Navy and merchant marine is to languish and decay. Fruitful fields, inviting commercial venture and giving promise of enlarged trade, are not to be occupied. Our vast system of internal improvements is to be neglected. The dark shadow of ignorance resting upon the people like a pall, precluding the possibility of good citizenship, is not to be lifted. The full measure of our just obligations to the defenders and preservers of the Republic is not to be discharged. In a word, this calculation is upon the hypothesis that the Democratic party is to use no more money than is necessary to keep the soul and body of the national life together.

Assuming such to be the settled policy of the Democratic party, there will be in the Treasury at the end of the next fiscal year seventy-five millions beyond the requirements for such a purpose.

That the accumulation of such a surplus must be averted there can be no question. A constantly accruing and ever increasing surplus not only invites to profligacy, but insures swift financial disaster. There can be, therefore, no conflict of opinion but that there must be such a modification of our tax laws as will insure a reduction of revenue to the basis of probable governmental expenditure. This would seem to be a problem easily solved, and indeed its solution would be attended with little difficulty if no other result was to be attained than a reduction of the surplus. In such case it would only be necessary to ascertain the sources of revenue and then cut off indiscriminately sufficient to insure the desired result. But a reduction of the revenue is not the only nor indeed the chief end to be attained. The method by which that reduction is to be accomplished has become the main point of controversy, and, indeed, the only point about which there is any serious conflict of opinion. Shall the proposed reduction be taken from internal or from customs revenues, or from both; and if from both, in what proportion from each? These are the questions of chief concern, and here parties divide and here the conflict begins.

What is the occasion for this division—why this conflict? It is this: We derive our revenues from two sources, internal taxation and a tax on imports. Our tariff on imports is to-day confessedly protective in that it is levied not with a view to raising "revenue only," but to protect American labor and encourage American industries. The Democratic party, or at least one wing of it, under the leadership of President Cleveland, assails this system, denouncing it as "vicious and illogical," and declares it to be not only unwise but unconstitutional; that duties on imports should be levied, in the language of the last national Democratic platform, for "revenue only," submitting of course to such accidental protection as may be incident thereto as an evil to be endured rather than an end to be attained. On the contrary, the Republican party believes in a protective tariff; that in imposing duties upon imports, revenue is not the only consideration, but that these duties should be so adjusted as to give encouragement to American enterprise, investment to American capital, and employment to American labor; and the Republican party insists that our present protective system shall not be disturbed except so far as it may be necessary to correct its incongruities and harmonize its provisions.

With these two conflicting theories it is easy to understand why the contest arises, at the very threshold, upon the method of reduction. If we reduce our revenues by removing or materially lessening internal taxes, our protective system can not be seriously disturbed; on the contrary, if we follow the lead of the President and secure a reduction by such a revision of the tariff as he proposes, leaving untouched our internal revenues, not only will our protective system be destroyed, but the nation itself will be well out on the highway to free trade. Therefore it is that the free-trader would take as little as possible from internal taxation that he may more successfully assail our protective policy; while the protectionist would take as much as possible from internal revenues that he may more surely defend it. At the foundation, therefore, of this controversy lies the question of policy which must be first settled before we can come to an intelligent consideration of the committee's bill; and as we are free-traders or protectionists that bill will be approved or condemned.

I propose, therefore, at this time to submit some general observations touching our revenue system, leaving the details of the proposed measure to an occasion when their consideration will be immediately in hand. I may pause a moment, however, in passing, to say of this measure as a whole that in its inception and presentation to this House it stands without a parallel in the history of American legislation. Conceived in darkness, brought forth in secrecy—its parentage carefully concealed—it was at last laid at the door of the Committee on Ways and Means [applause], where the majority took it up as tenderly as though it were their legitimate offspring and hurriedly brought the "lump of deformity" into this House, to be adopted by the Democratic party and nursed by the harlot of free trade. [Laughter and applause.] But whatever its parentage, whether British free-trader or the Cobden Club—either of whom are capable of the outrage—justice compels me to state that public suspicion does not attach to any member of the majority [laughter]; and in further vindication of their high character it will be no violation of the secrets of the committee-room to state that, when pressed upon this point, there was no member of the majority so lost to all sense of personal pride as to admit the parentage. [Applause.]

But seriously. Think of the majority of a great committee of this House, charged with the duty of considering an important message of the President of the United States, hiding away from the minority of that committee for six weeks and in some secret place taking counsel possibly of the enemies of our industries without consultation with the minority, framing a measure involving the industrial prosperity of 60,000,000 of people; and when completed and presented to the full committee, that same majority refusing to enter upon consideration of its provisions or to disclose any data upon which their action was based; stolidly refusing to answer any and every question propounded by the minority touching any portion of the bill; submitting to no modification in a single particular, unless suggested by the majority; declining to listen to any member of this House in behalf of the people he represents; refusing audience to Senators, the industries of whose States were to be crippled or destroyed; rejecting all appeals from manufacturers whose connection with their industries enabled them to point out the pernicious effects of the proposed measure; refusing to hear one word of protest from the farmer whose flocks and fields are to be despoiled; shutting the door of the committee-room in the face of the laboring men of the country who came to plead for the protection of their homes and their families; imagine, I say, such conduct on the part of a committee of this House and you have a faint conception of the Committee on Ways and Means of the Fiftieth Congress. [Applause.]

But to resume the course of my argument. We have to-day a double system of taxation, direct and indirect. Heretofore it has never been the settled policy of the Government to permanently maintain both. A choice of methods was open to the founders of the Republic, and they wisely determined to raise the needed revenue for the support of the Government by imposing a duty on imports. That method has never been suspended. It has undergone modifications, at different times, to conform to party demands, but it has never for an hour been wholly abandoned. It is the approved and established method of providing for the ordinary expenses of the Government. True, direct taxation has sometimes been resorted to to meet unforeseen national emergencies, but heretofore it has always been abandoned so soon as the exigency had passed. Previous to the war of the rebellion direct taxation was invoked only in two instances—first in 1791, to meet the extraordinary demands of a new Government with an empty Treasury and an unestablished credit, and again in 1813, to provide the sinews of war in the second conflict with Great Britain. In both instances, however, direct taxation was abandoned at the earliest moment consistent with national honor and safety. The law of 1791 remained in force but nine years, and was repealed at the earnest solicitation of President Jefferson, while the act of 1813, after having been on the statute-books but four years, was expunged upon the recommendation of President Monroe.

During the whole period of our national history from 1789 to 1862, nearly three-quarters of a century, not more than $22,000,000 of our revenues were derived from direct taxation. In 1862, for the third time, we supplemented our customs law by internal taxes, to meet the extraordinary demands of the civil war, and have continued these exactions until the National Treasury is overflowing with a needless surplus. Now for the first time it is proposed to ingraft the system of direct taxation onto the body of our revenue laws, to be permanently maintained, with its army of four thousand officials, at an annual cost to the people of more than $1,000,000. But I have alluded to this only for the purpose of showing that heretofore it has been the settled policy of the Government, under all parties and at all times, to rely entirely upon revenues derived from a tariff on imports, to meet the ordinary expenses of the Government; and that direct taxation has never been resorted to except to meet some unforeseen national emergency, and heretofore promptly abandoned when the emergency had passed. Whatever conflict of opinion, therefore, may now exist touching the abolition or modification of our internal-revenue system of taxation there can be no question that to supply the needed revenues for the ordinary expenses of the Government by duty on imports has been from the beginning the established policy of the Government.

Yet, in the face of the uniform practice of all parties from the foundation of the Government, the gentleman from Texas criticises the course of the Republican party in this regard. Chagrined at the disclosure made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCKINLEY] in the views of the minority that the Democratic party since 1866, though in control of the House of Representatives eleven years of the time, has reduced taxation only a little over $6,000,000, while in the eleven years of Republican control we reduced taxation more than $362,000,000, he seeks to escape the arraignment by criticising the character of our reduction. Seventy-eight million dollars of it came from putting tea and coffee on the free-list, and other modifications of the tariff; $284,000,000 by removing internal taxes. But these were war taxes, imposed for war purposes, and to have retained them would have been an exaction as unnecessary as it would have been despotic. More than this, to have continued these exactions would have surely overthrown and destroyed our protective system. Let me say to the gentleman that the Republican party is not prepared to substitute direct taxation, with all its inquisitorial methods, for that beneficial policy which, while yielding sufficient revenue, fosters American industries and protects American labor. [Applause.] But I must remind the gentleman that in the reduction of $6,000,000 by his party they lost sight of the poor man's blanket and the necessaries of life and relieved that portion of our fellow-citizens who were staggering under the load of taxed snuff, tobacco, and whisky.

Assuming that the American people will not abandon a policy adopted by the fathers and approved by a century of experience, I come to the consideration of the vital point at issue, namely, upon what articles shall duties be imposed, and to what extent shall they be levied—with regard to revenue only or for the double purpose of revenue and protection? Shall the theories of the free-trader prevail and dominate in the revision of our tariff, or shall it continue to be adjusted not only with a view to revenue but for the promotion of American interests? This is the question at issue. In this contest the Republican party takes the side of protection and will resist to the uttermost any attempt coming from whatever source it may to cripple American industries, destroy American capital, or pauperize American labor. In adhering to this policy of protection the Republican party can invoke the teachings of the fathers whose patriotism and sagacity laid the foundations of the Republic. The first Congress that assembled under our national Constitution was confronted with an enormous debt, an uncertain credit, and an empty Treasury. Its first duty was to provide sufficient revenue to meet the national demands.

They conceived that in the exercise of the power of taxation and that no less important power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, that there were other and higher considerations than the mere requirement of revenue. Smarting under the recollection of the industrial thralldom imposed upon them by the British Government, reflecting upon the impotency of the Confederation to guard and promote the general welfare, they naturally embraced the earliest opportunity under the National Government to devise a plan not only for raising revenue, but for laying the foundations of that industrial independence which in its results has made the Republic the marvel of the world. So it was that having determined to secure the needed revenues by a duty on imports they proceeded to declare that in the imposition of such duties regard should be had not only to revenue but to the development of American industries in the following express terms:

> Whereas it is necessary for the support of Government, for the discharge of the debts of the United States, and for the encouragement and protection of manufacture that duties be laid on goods, wares, and merchandise imported: Therefore,
> Be it enacted, etc.

Here, then, in the beginning we have the bold avowal of the fathers that duties are to be levied not only for revenue but to encourage and protect American manufactures, which declaration received the support of such illustrious men as Madison, Lee, King, Ellsworth, Ames, Trumbull, and Roger Sherman, and the approval of that most illustrious of Presidents and patriots, George Washington. In the course of debate upon this first tariff measure Fisher Ames said:

> I conceive that the present Constitution was dedicated by commercial interest more than any other cause. The want of an efficient government to secure the manufacturing interests and to advance our commerce was long seen by men of judgment and pointed out by patriots solicitous to promote our general welfare.

George Washington, in his annual message to Congress, said:

> Congress have repeatedly and not without success directed their attention to the encouragement of manufactures. The object is of too much consequence not to insure a continuance of their efforts in every way which shall appear eligible.

John Adams, in a special message to Congress, said:

> The manufacture of arms within the United States still invites the attention of the National Legislature. At a considerable expense to the public this manufactory has been brought to such a state of maturity as with continued encouragement will supersede the necessity of future importations from foreign countries.

Thomas Jefferson, in his second annual message, said:

> To cultivate peace and maintain commerce and navigation in all their lawful enterprises, to foster our fisheries as nurseries to navigation for the nurture of man, and to protect the manufactures adapted to our circumstances, these are the landmarks by which we are to guide ourselves.

In a letter to Benjamin Austin, in 1816, he further said:

> We have experienced what we did not then believe that there existed, both profligacy and power enough to exclude us from the field of exchanges with other nations. That to be independent for the comforts of life we must fabricate them ourselves. We must now place our manufacturers by the side of the agriculturist. The former question is now suppressed, or rather assumes a new form. The grand inquiry now is, shall we make our own comforts or go without them at the will of a foreign nation? He therefore who is now against domestic manufactures must be for reducing us either to dependence upon that nation or to be clothed in skins and live like beasts in dens and caverns. I am proud to say that I am not one of these. Experience has taught me that manufactures are now as necessary to our independence as to our comfort.

James Madison, in 1809, in a special message to Congress, declared:

> The revision of our commercial laws appropriate to adapt them to the arrangement which has taken place with Great Britain will doubtless engage the early attention of Congress. It will be worthy at the same time of their just and provident care to make such further alterations in the laws as will more especially protect and foster the several branches of manufacture which have been recently instituted or extended by the laudable exertions of our citizens.

James Monroe, in his inaugural address in 1817, declared:

> Our manufactures will likewise require the systematic and fostering care of the Government. Possessing as we do all the raw materials, the fruit of our own soil and industry, we ought not to depend in the degree we have done on supplies from other countries. While we are thus dependent the sudden event of war unsought and unexpected can not fail to plunge us into the most serious difficulties. It is important, too, that the capital which nourishes our manufactures should be domestic, as its influence, in that case, instead of exhausting, as it must do in foreign hands, would be felt advantageously on agriculture and on every branch of industry. Equally important is it to provide at home a market for our raw materials, as by extending the competition it will enhance the price and protect the cultivator against the casualties incident to foreign markets.

John Quincy Adams, in his fourth annual message to Congress, speaking of the agricultural, commercial, and manufacturing interests of the nation, said:

> All these interests are alike under the protecting power of legislative authority.

Again, on another occasion, he said:

> Is the self-protecting energy of this nation so helpless that there exists in the political institutions of our country no power to counteract this foreign legislation that growers of grain must submit to this exclusion from the foreign markets of their products, that the shippers must dismantle their ships, the trade of the North stagnate at the wharves, and the manufacturers starve at their looms, while the whole people shall pay tribute to foreign industry, to be clad in foreign garb; that the Congress of the Union are impotent to restore the balance in favor of native industry destroyed by the statutes of another realm?

Andrew Jackson, in his annual message to Congress, said:

> The power to impose duties on imports originally belonged to the several States. The right to adjust these duties with a view to the encouragement of domestic branches of industry is so completely identical with that power that it is difficult to suppose the existence of the one without the other. The States have delegated their whole authority over imports to the Federal Government. This authority having thus entirely passed from the States, the right to exercise it for the purpose of protection does not exist in them, and consequently if it be not possessed by the General Government it must be extinct. Our political system would thus present the anomaly of a people stripped of the right to foster their own industry and to counteract the most selfish and destructive policy which might be adopted by foreign nations. This surely can not be the case.

In a letter written in 1824 he further said:

> Heaven smiled upon us and gave us liberty and independence. The same Providence has blessed us with the means of national independence and national defense. He has filled our mountains and plains with minerals, with lead, iron, and copper, and given us a climate and soil for the growing of hemp and wool. These being the great materials of our national defense, they ought to have extended to them adequate and fair protection, that our manufacturers and laborers may be placed in a fair competition with those of Europe.

On another occasion he acknowledged the receipt of a home-made hat in the following terms:

> A few days since I had the pleasure to receive the grass hat which you had been pleased to present and forward to Mrs. Jackson as a token of the respect and esteem entertained for my public services. Permit me, sir, to return to you my grateful acknowledgment for the honor conferred upon us in this token. Mrs. Jackson will wear with pride a hat made by American hands and made of American materials. Its workmanship, reflecting the highest credit upon the authors, will be regarded as an evidence of the perfection which our domestic manufacturers may hereafter acquire if properly fostered and protected. Upon the success of our manufactures, as the handmaid of agriculture and commerce, depends in a great measure the independence of our country, and I assure you that none can feel more sensibly than I do the necessity of encouraging them.

These citations, from the pen and lips of illustrious statesmen in approval of a protective policy, might be multiplied indefinitely, but with the words of General Garfield I close the recital. In his letter accepting the Republican nomination for the Presidency in 1880 he said:

> In reference to our custom laws a policy should be pursued which will bring revenues to the Treasury and will enable the labor and capital employed in our great industries to compete fairly in our own markets with the labor and capital of foreign producers. We legislate for the people of the United States and not for the whole world, and it is our glory that the American laborer is more intelligent and better paid than his foreign competitor. Our country can not be independent unless its people, with their abundant natural resources, possess the requisite skill at any time to clothe, arm, and equip themselves for war, and in time of peace to produce all the necessary implements of labor. It was the manifest intention of the founders of the Government to provide for the common defense, not by standing arms alone, but by raising among the people a greater army of artisans, whose intelligence and skill should powerfully contribute to the safety and glory of the nation.

But this policy of protection has been approved not only by the foremost patriots and statesmen of the Republic, but its wisdom has been confirmed by a century of national experience. We have tried both systems, a protective tariff and a tariff for revenue only, and I affirm without fear of contradiction, and I appeal to the history of the country in confirmation of the assertion, that the periods of protection in this country have been periods of prosperity and that the eras of free trade or a revenue tariff have been eras of depression and disaster.

We began our national career substantially without manufacturing. During our colonial history it was the policy of the British Government to prevent the establishment of manufacturing industries on this side of the Atlantic. Then as now her insatiate greed knew no restraint but the limit of her power. The policy of the English Government at that time was graphically outlined in an article on "Trade," published in London in 1750, as follows:

Manufactures in our American colonies should be discouraged and prohibited. We ought always to keep a watchful eye over our colonies to restrain them from setting up any of the manufactures which are carried on in Great Britain, and any such attempts should be crushed in the beginning. As they will have the providing rough materials to themselves, so shall we have the manufacturing of them. If any encouragement be given for raising hemp, flax, etc., doubtless they will soon begin manufacturing if not prevented; therefore, to stop the progress of any such manufacture it is proposed that no weaver have the liberty to set up any looms without first registering at an office kept for that purpose; that all slitting mills and engines for drawing wire or weaving stockings be put down; that all negroes be prohibited from weaving either linen or woolen or spinning or combing wool or working in any manufacture of iron further than making it into pig or bar iron; that they also be prohibited from manufacturing hats, stockings, or leather of any kind. This limitation will not abridge the planters of any liberty they now enjoy; on the contrary, they will then turn their attention to farming and raising those rough materials. If we examine into the circumstances of the inhabitants of our plantations and our own it will appear that not one-fourth of their product redounds to their own profit, for out of all that comes here they only carry back clothing and other accommodations for their families, all of which is of the merchandise and manufacture of this kingdom. All these advantages we receive by the plantations, besides the mortgages on the planter's estate and the high interest they pay us, which is very considerable.

It was in this spirit that a manufacturing establishment in South Carolina was by act of Parliament declared a public nuisance and abated; and an English statesman but echoed the dominating voice of British counsels when he declared that the colonies should not be permitted to manufacture a hobnail within their borders.

But the tariff act of July 4, 1789, to which I have alluded, broke the fetters of commercial thralldom and gave to the nation industrial independence. While the early tariff acts were designed to give encouragement to domestic manufacturing, yet not until 1824 was a measure enacted sufficiently protective to guarantee capital and labor from ruinous foreign competition. Previous to that date our manufacturing industries were of feeble and uncertain growth. True, they received additional stimulus by the embargo of the war of 1812; but no sooner was peace declared than they went down before a flood of foreign importations that swept them into ruin. England, though forced to acknowledge our independence, was determined not to lose her American market, and there was no diplomacy, however questionable, no sacrifice, however onerous, that she did not invoke to retain it. Foreign goods were put upon our market at a loss to the manufacturer, with the deliberate purpose of destroying our industries. Mr. Brougham, in the House of Commons in 1816, made public avowal of such a purpose, declaring—

It was well worth while to incur a loss upon the first exportation in order by the glut to stifle in the cradle those infant manufactures in the United States which the war had forced into existence contrary to the natural order of things.

Horace Greeley, giving his personal recollection of this period, said:

My distinct personal recollections of this head go back to the period of industrial derangement, business collapse, and widespread pecuniary ruin which closely followed the close in 1815 of our last war with Great Britain. Peace found this country dotted with furnaces and factories, which had suddenly sprung up under the precarious shelter of embargo and war. These found themselves suddenly exposed to a determined and relentless competition. Great Britain had pushed her fabrics into almost every corner of the world. Of some of these great stocks had nevertheless accumulated, out of fashion and only salable far below cost. These were thrown on our market in a perfect deluge. Our manufactures went down like grain before the mower. Our agriculture and the wages of labor speedily followed. In New England I judge that fully one-quarter of the property went through the sheriff's mill, and the prostration was scarcely less general elsewhere. In New York the principal merchants united (1817) in a memorial to Congress to save our commerce as well as our manufactures from utter ruin by increasing the tariff and prohibiting the sale at auction of imported fabrics.

Henry Clay, speaking in the United States Senate of our industrial condition immediately preceding the tariff of 1824, declared:

If I were to select any term of seven years since the adoption of the present Constitution which exhibited a scene of the most widespread dismay and desolation, it would be exactly that term of seven years which immediately preceded the establishment of the tariff of 1824.

But this era of protection was followed by the tariff of 1824 and 1828 which enthused new life into our languishing industries and brought to the country a period of marvelous prosperity. The leading metropolitan journal epitomizes the history of this period as follows:

So soon as the tariff of 1824 went into operation the whole aspect and course of affairs were changed. Activity took the place of sluggishness. Capital was invested; labor came into demand; wages advanced; mines were opened; furnaces built; mills started; shops multiplied; business revived in all its departments. Revenue flowed copiously into the coffers of the Government. The debts created by two expensive wars were entirely paid off. Such a scene of general prosperity had never before been seen by our people.

President Jackson said in his annual message December 4, 1832:

Our country presents on every side marks of prosperity and happiness unequaled in any other portion of the world.

Mr. Clay, in speaking of this era of protection, said:

If the term of seven years were to be selected of the greatest prosperity which this people have enjoyed since the establishment of their present Constitution it would be exactly that period of seven years which immediately followed the passage of the tariff of 1824.

But unfortunately this era of protection and prosperity was followed by the compromise tariff of 1833, which provided for a gradual reduction of duties until they should reach an average of not to exceed 20 per cent. And what was the effect of this change of policy? Long before that limit had been reached the evidences of its pernicious influence were everywhere visible. Capital invested in industrial enterprises, to save itself from absolute destruction, was withdrawn. Contemplated expansion of business was abandoned, our manufacturers one after another went down under a torrent of foreign importations, while American labor stood idle and empty-handed in presence of the appalling and widespread desolation which culminated in the frightful panic of 1837. And not only the people but the Government itself became so impoverished that the President of the United States was forced into a broker's shop to raise his overdue and unpaid salary. In 1842 the protective system was again invoked, and under its salutary influence our drooping industries revived and prosperity took the place of disaster. The general effect upon the country of the tariff of 1842 is best described by President Polk in his annual message in 1846:

Labor in all its branches is receiving an ample reward, while education, science, and the arts are rapidly enlarging the means of social happiness. The progress of our country in her career of greatness, not only in the vast extension of our territorial limits or in the rapid increase of our population, but in resources and wealth and in the happy condition of our people, is without an example in the history of nations.

But this brief period of prosperity was quickly followed by the revenue tariff of 1846 and 1857, which brought to the country another era of industrial depression, culminating in the panic of 1857, the disastrous consequences of which are still within the memory of living men. Universal bankruptcy overtook the people, and the Government with an empty Treasury was forced in times of peace to borrow money at a discount of from 12 to 30 per cent. Then came the era of protection in 1861, which has now been extended over a period of more than a quarter of a century, and who does not know that during these eventful years our industrial advancement has been steady and without a parallel in the history of the Republic?

In spite of the constant and frightful drain upon our resources, incident to and consequent upon a protracted war, we have nevertheless rapidly grown in national strength, until we stand to-day a marvel of industrial development. In 1860 we were without credit at home or abroad; to-day our securities are sought for investments and command a premium everywhere. Then, with an empty national Treasury, we were borrowing money at an exorbitant rate of interest to meet the ordinary expenses of the Government; to-day, with every matured obligation discharged and a Treasury overflowing, we authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to anticipate our obligations. Our manufacturing products have grown from less than $2,000,000,000 annually to nearly $7,000,000,000, advancing us from the third to the front rank of the manufacturing nations of the world. Our farm values have increased from a trifle over $3,000,000,000 in 1860 to more than $10,000,000,000 in 1880, producing an annual harvest value of more than $3,000,000,000. In 1860 England boasted of a national wealth as the result of her free-trade policy of $30,600,000,000, while our aggregate accumulations were only $16,000,000,000; but during these years of protection, under the most adverse circumstances, we have passed her in the industrial race, and while she lags behind with only $42,000,000,000 of accumulated wealth, we are the proud possessors of more than $50,000,000,000.

I submit, therefore, that our protective system comes down to us not only with the recommendation of the fathers, but its wisdom has been confirmed by a century of national experience. A policy of taxation thus doubly sanctioned and confirmed ought not lightly to be abandoned and destroyed; and yet it is proposed by the majority of the Committee on Ways and Means to reverse this beneficent policy, and under the advantageous pressure of an overflowing Treasury assail and demolish our protective system. The authors of this measure assure us that it will work a reduction of the revenues $78,000,000 annually. To accomplish this it is proposed to take only $24,000,000 from internal taxation and the balance of $54,000,000 from duties on imports. This reduction of $54,000,000 on imports is sought to be secured by transferring from the dutiable to the free list a large number of articles, among them wool, lumber, salt, flax, and other products of the farm and factory, upon which a revenue was derived last year of $22,000,000, and the balance of $32,000,000 is sought to be obtained by lowering the duties all along the line upon that false theory that in proportion as you lower the duty on imports you will diminish the revenue derived therefrom. These are the three methods employed in this bill to secure the proposed reduction of $78,000,000. Now, I submit that in taking only $24,000,000 from internal taxation, while we are collecting annually $120,000,000 from this source, confirms the public belief that this administration and its supporters are more anxious to assail and impair our protective system than to relieve the Treasury of its plethoric condition. While yielding to the general demand of all parties for a reduction of the surplus they insist that such a result shall be reached only through the methods of free trade. Hence only $24,000,000 is to be taken from internal taxation while $54,000,000 is to be secured by a revision of the tariff.

But what is the revision proposed by this bill? First by putting on the free-list articles which last year yielded a revenue of $22,000,000. Now, all parties agree that anything and everything which is not and can not be produced in this country, and can not therefore come in competition with any domestic industry, shall be admitted free of duty. But the free-list in this bill goes far beyond that and exposes to foreign assault many of our most important industries, particularly those of agriculture. There is not a schedule of our tariff it does not invade. The great wool-growing interest of the country, a matter of prime necessity to a civilized people, only in the infancy of its development, capable of producing, if properly fostered and encouraged, the material for the clothing of all our people, is to be exposed to a ruinous foreign competition which will surely prove its ultimate destruction with all the capital invested therein. The majority of the Committee on Ways and Means in their report on this bill seek to delude the people with the idea that free wool means cheaper wool, and with it cheaper clothing, and that the farmers can well afford to submit to the destruction of sheep husbandry that they may thereby obtain cheaper woolen goods.

That wool would be cheaper while our foreign rivals were engaged in destroying this domestic industry is quite possible; but when they have completed their work of demolition, when they have driven our flocks to the slaughter-pen and eliminated from our market an annual production of 300,000,000 pounds of domestic wool, we will find ourselves bound, hand and foot, manufacturers and consumers alike, at the mercy of the foreign producer. What restraint then will there be upon his power or cupidity?

What I have said touching this industry will apply with equal force to the main body of the free-list. But I must pass on to the third method proposed, namely, the reduction of rates on the dutiable list, and here we enter the field of speculation. Now, I do not hesitate to affirm that, taking this measure as a whole, no man living, even if a member of the secret cabal that framed it, is audacious enough to predict with any degree of certainty the amount of reduction it will secure. That the $24,000,000 taken from internal taxation and the $22,000,000 surrendered by the additions to the free-list will secure a reduction of $46,000,000 there can be no question. This much is certain.

But whether the further reduction of $32,000,000 will follow by the lowering of duties is a matter of the vaguest speculation, with the probabilities that such a course will augment rather than diminish the revenues. The natural tendency of such a policy will be to cripple and destroy competing American industries, stimulate importations, and increase the surplus. Such a result is strikingly exemplified in the history of our wool industry in connection with the tariff of 1883. By that act the duty on wool was slightly lowered, and what was the effect? Our flocks and fleeces diminished, importations increased, and our revenue from this source nearly doubled. The number of our sheep fell off from 50,620,626 in 1884 to 44,759,314 in 1887, a net loss of nearly 6,000,000 head in three years, with a corresponding reduction in the wool clip from 308,000,000 pounds in 1884 to 265,000,000 in 1887, a shrinkage of 43,000,000 pounds; while importations rapidly rose from 70,595,000 pounds in 1883 to 129,084,000 pounds in 1886; increasing the revenue in spite of the lowering of duties from $3,174,628 in 1883 to $5,126,108 in 1887. By the act of 1883 duties were lowered on wool, worsteds, knit goods, yarns, wearing apparel, and shoddy and kindred materials, and the revenue derived from the importations of these six articles during the three years following this act were greater by $11,465,503 than during the three years immediately preceding.

But I have alluded to this in this connection not so much for the purpose of showing the impracticability of the proposed method as to call attention to the fact that the majority of the Committee on Ways and Means proposed to take only $24,000,000 from internal taxation, while a reduction of $54,000,000 is attempted to be secured by the lowering or total abolition of duties on imports in the interest of foreign rival industries and to the detriment and destruction of our own. This fact alone is sufficient to confirm public apprehension and belief that the Democratic party, or at least the controlling wing of it, while professing an anxiety to relieve the people of unnecessary taxation, is much more anxious to destroy our protective system than to stop the accumulation of a needless surplus. With an easy and open way to a sure and ample reduction of the revenues without disturbing a single American industry or paralyzing a single arm of labor, yet the Democratic party declines to walk therein, preferring that other course, strewn with the wrecks of a nation's experience and fraught with the utmost peril to all our interests and all our people.

But this was to be expected. It is only following the general course commanded by the President in his annual message. True, in the exuberance of his zeal for free trade he advises no modification whatever of our internal-revenue system, but that the entire reduction should be secured by a revision of the tariff which should abolish all duties on some of our most important industries and lower others sufficient to secure the desired end; but even the free-trade wing of the Democratic party lacked the courage to at once occupy this advanced position. [Applause.] For prudential reasons it seemed advisable to move with greater caution. That the plan of the President and his party, if carried into execution, even as proposed in this bill, would prove disastrous to American industries and American labor can not be questioned. It is impossible to secure the necessary reduction of revenue by the abolition or lowering of duties without exposing our domestic industries to the most ruinous foreign competition. But the President seeks to allay public apprehension in this regard by declaring that in the execution of this plan care will be taken not to cripple or destroy our manufactures or work "loss of employment to the workingman or the lessening of his wages." As if his plan could be carried out without working such a result.

As well might the surgeon, having announced his intention to remove the heart of his patient, seek to allay his fears by the assurance that he would not disturb his circulation or impair his physical energies. [Laughter and applause.] One is as preposterous as the other. But the President, and I suppose the authors and advocates of this measure, will endeavor to induce the American people to submit to this suicidal operation by administering some sort of a narcotic, which for the moment will dethrone their judgment and make them oblivious to the dangers of the experiment. And here let me say there is nothing so conducive to this state of insensibility as the seductive influence of that theory that a duty on imports is a tax on the consumer. Once induce the people to believe that they are unjustly taxed and there is no political quackery they will not endure which gives promise of relief. Conscious of this fact, the President in his annual message reasserts in the most positive manner that theory, which I had supposed was long since exploded, that a duty imposed upon an imported article by so much enhances the price of such article to the consumer, and that therefore the removal of such duty would proportionately reduce the price. To show that I do not misrepresent the views of the President in this regard I beg to quote the following:

> But our present tariff laws, the vicious, inequitable, and illogical source of unnecessary taxation, ought to be at once revised and amended. These laws, as their primary and plain effect, raise the price to consumers of all articles imported and subject to duty by precisely the sum paid for such duties. Thus the amount of the duty measures the tax paid by those who purchase for use these imported articles. Many of these things, however, are raised or manufactured in our own country, and the duties now levied upon foreign goods and products are called protection to these home manufactures, because they render it possible for those of our people who are manufacturers to make these taxed articles and sell them for a price equal to that demanded for the imported goods that have paid customs duty. So it happens that while comparatively a few use the imported articles, millions of our people, who never use and never saw any of the foreign products, purchase and use things of the same kind made in this country, and pay therefor nearly or quite the same enhanced price which the duty adds to the imported articles. Those who buy imports pay the duty charged thereon into the public Treasury, but the great majority of our citizens, who buy domestic articles of the same class, pay a sum at least approximately equal to this duty to the home manufacturer. This reference to the operation of our tariff laws is not made by way of instruction, but in order that we may be constantly reminded of the manner in which they impose a burden upon those who consume domestic products as well as those who consume imported articles, and thus create a tax upon all our people.

I should have thought the insensate pen with which the President wrote that paragraph would have refused to record the error. If it could have spoken it would have said to the President, "The very pen with which you write this folly is cheaper by one half than before the duty was imposed." [Applause.] But not only in the paragraph quoted is this theory affirmed, but the whole tenor of the message is in harmony with this expressed utterance. The President seems actually to believe that a duty imposed upon an imported article by so much enhances the cost of such article to the consumer, and is therefore a direct tax upon him to the amount of such duty, and therefore that the lessening or removal of such duty would by so much cheapen the article to the purchaser. He affirms with equal confidence that the duty imposed upon an imported article not only raises the price of such foreign article, but at the same time advances in equal degree the price of the entire domestic product, and then to aggravate the seeming injustice we are reminded that while the Treasury is benefited only to the extent of the duty collected, the enhanced price of the domestic product goes into the pocket of the manufacturer to swell his already ill-gotten fortune. This is the substance, the beginning and the end of the President's argument in support of the policy he champions, and I doubt not it will be echoed and re-echoed by every free-trader in the United States, as it has been hailed with unrestrained delight by every free-trader in England.

The gentleman from Texas asserts the same theory, and the whole burden of his speech is based upon the false assumption that a duty is a tax paid by the consumer. He says if the laboring man pays $10 for a suit of clothes, and a duty of 100 per cent. is added, it advances the price to $20, which inures to the benefit of the manufacturer, and robs the laborer. I am not surprised that the President should fall into this error, but it is unpardonable in the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means.

But what answer is to be made to this theory? There is one at least comprehensive and complete. It is not true. I commend to the President his admonition to others, to remember "it is a condition which confronts us, not a theory;" and that condition is an absolute refutation of his theory. [Applause.] It is not true that a protective duty is a tax paid by the consumer. It is not true that a protective duty enhances by so much the price of the article. It is not true that the duty on the foreign product raises by so much the whole volume of the competing domestic product; and in support of this denial I can summon as unimpeachable witnesses every established manufacturing industry in the United States. Call the roll of your industries, your iron, steel, glass, pottery, the whole array of American industries, and they will bear concurrent testimony to the fact that the duty of which you complain has been the means of reducing the price of their products to the consumer. I challenge any man to name the product of a single well-established American industry that can not be bought cheaper to-day under our protective system than during any period of our history under free trade or a tariff for revenue only.

Take as an illustration our steel-rail industry, and let us see if the theory of the President is correct. The first Bessemer-steel rail made in this country was in 1865. At that time there was a duty of 45 per cent. on the foreign product, which continued until January 1, 1871, when the act of Congress went into effect which imposed a specific duty of $28 a ton. In 1867 steel rails were selling in the American market for $166 a ton in currency, or $138 in gold. In 1870 the price had fallen to $106.75, when the duty of $28 was imposed. Now, if the theory of the President be correct, the imposition of the duty of $28 would have had the effect of advancing the price by the amount of such duty from $106.75 a ton to $134.75. But what in fact was the result? Under the stimulating effect of this protection the product of our steel-rail mills rose from 2,277 tons in 1867 to 2,101,904 tons in 1887, giving investment to millions of capital and employment to thousands of laborers, while the price went down from $166 a ton in 1867 to $31.50 in March, 1888. In the light of this example what becomes of the theory that the duty enhances the cost and becomes a tax upon the consumer?

Let me say to the President, "It is a condition that confronts us, not a theory."

Take the case of "blankets," to which the chairman alluded. A pair of 5-pound blankets were recently imported at the lowest possible cost. The statement of the cost, duty paid, is as follows:

Cost in England at wholesale	$4.45
Duty	4.25
Customs fees	.65
Total	9.35

If the theory is true, these blankets ought to sell for $9.35 a pair; but, as a matter of fact, American blankets of precisely the same weight and quality were selling at that time for $5.20. What becomes of the theory that the duty is added to the cost? [Applause.]

But a more forcible illustration, if possible, of the unsoundness of the President's theory is found in the history of a recently established industry in his own State. Previous to 1884 there was not a pound of soda-ash manufactured in the United States. We consume annually 175,000 tons in the manufacture of glass and other American products. Previous to 1884 we imported every pound of it at an average cost of $48 a ton. A duty of $5 was imposed, and the Solvay Process Company was organized at Syracuse, the only one on this hemisphere, at a cost of $1,500,000, with a capacity of 50,000 tons annually. It commenced manufacturing soda-ash in January, 1884. How has it affected the price of this commodity? Was the duty of $5 added to the $48, advancing the cost to $53 a ton? On the contrary, it fell in the American market as low as $28 a ton in three years, a saving to the people annually of $20 a ton on the entire consumption of the 175,000 tons, or $3,500,000. Again I say to the President, "It is a condition that confronts us, not a theory." But I need not multiply instances; they are as numerous as our industries. You can not touch a manufactured article on the farm or in the home, the product of a protected American industry, that has not been made cheaper by reason of such protection. Why, there are many things the market value of which is lower than the duty, and how idle, therefore, to say that the duty is added to the cost. But the difficulty with the President's theory is he forgets that the price of a commodity does not depend upon the rate of duty, but rather upon the great law of supply and demand—a law universal in its application and unvarying in its results. If the supply of a given article be limited and the demand great the price will be high; and, on the contrary, if the supply be abundant and the demand limited, the price will be low. Therefore it is if by a protective tariff we can establish and maintain a domestic industry which otherwise, by reason of unrestrained foreign competition, could not exist, we will thereby increase the product of such industry and inevitably bring down the price. Alexander Hamilton, nearly a century ago, formulated this law when he said:

> But though it were true that the immediate and certain effect of a tariff was an increase of price, it is universally proved that the contrary is the ultimate effect with every successful manufacture. When a domestic manufacture has attained to perfection, and has engaged in the prosecution of it a competitive number of persons, it can be afforded and accordingly seldom or never fails to be sold cheaper, in process of time, than the foreign article for which it is a substitute. The internal competition which takes place soon does away with everything like monopoly and reduces the price of the article to the minimum of a reasonable profit on the capital employed. This accords with the reason of the thing and with experience.

But further comment is unnecessary to expose the fallacy of the assumption that a duty imposed upon an imported article by so much enhances the cost of such article to the consumer and therefore becomes to that extent a tax upon him.

But the gentleman from Texas, while admitting that wages are higher here than in Europe, denies that it is attributable to our protective tariff. If so, he asks why are not wages uniform throughout the United States? He might as well assert that because manufacturing industries are not equally developed throughout this country therefore their establishment and maintenance is not attributable to our protective system. It is not pretended that a protective tariff, in and of itself, affects wages; but it does build up manufacturing industries, creates a demand for labor, and as a consequence increases its compensation. Wages are not uniform throughout the United States because the cost of production is not uniform. But the gentleman charges that labor is not sharing in the benefits of our protective system. Let me quote from Edward Atkinson, whom the gentleman pronounces "one of the clearest thinkers and writers on political economy of the present day:"

> In the judgment of the commissioner of savings-banks and of many others who are competent to form an opinion, at least three-fourths of the present deposits in these banks belong to those who are strictly of the working classes in the limited sense in which those whose daily work is necessary to their daily bread make use of that term. This system of savings-banks is practically limited to New England and the Middle States. The total sum on deposit in all those States is now computed at $1,100,000,000, at an average of $356 to each depositor. If the system were extended throughout the country, and the deposit per capita of the people of the United States were equal to that of Massachusetts, the total sum would amount to somewhat over $8,400,000,000.
> Another fact may be cited which fairly sustains the general statement that those who do the actual work of production are now securing to their own use a larger share than ever before of the joint product of labor and capital.

Again this author says:

> Wages of mechanics in Massachusetts were 25 per cent. more in 1885 than in 1860, while the purchasing power of money was 26 per cent. greater, and the working man could either raise his standard of living, or on the same standard save one-third of his wages.

But the chairman of the committee suggests that this protective system is crippling our commerce. He forgets that in 1860, the close of the last period of a low tariff, our exports were only $336,576,057, and imports, $356,616,119, leaving a balance of trade against us of $20,040,062. In 1880 our exports had risen to $835,638,658, and imports, $667,954,746, leaving a balance of trade in our favor of $167,683,912, an amount one-half as large as our entire export trade in 1860. Our total commerce in 1860 aggregated only $687,000,000, while in 1880 it reached $1,500,000,000. [Applause.]

It is an interesting fact that during the period of a low tariff, from 1848 to 1860 inclusive, there was but one year in which the balance of trade was in our favor, and the net balance against us in these thirteen years was $396,216,161, drawn out of the country in gold to pay for foreign goods. Yet during the last thirteen years, under a protective tariff, only one year has the balance of trade been against us, while the aggregate in our favor has reached the magnificent sum of $1,612,659,755. [Applause.]

The country will not suffer from changing foreign trade from $400,000,000 against us to $1,600,000,000 in our favor.

But the gentleman from Texas, referring to duties on imports, characterizes them as "war taxes; that they still remain and that they are heavier to-day than the average during the last five years of the existence of hostilities; that the average rate of duty during the last five years, from 1883 to 1887, inclusive, on dutiable goods amounted to 44.51 per cent., and that during the last year the average duty was 47.10 per cent." It will be observed that the gentleman speaks only of dutiable imports omitting all imports received free of duty. The average rate on the entire importations he prudently withholds making his calculation not only misleading, but entirely valueless. To illustrate: The duty of Cognac oil is 533 per cent. If everything else were omitted free of duty—if after the close of the war we had put all else on the free-list—it would be literally true that the average rate on dutiable goods would be 533 per cent., and greater now than during the war, when it was only 31 per cent., but it would convey no idea of the average on our entire importations. [Applause.] We are paying a duty of 134 per cent. on rice in the husks, and if that was the only dutiable article imported it would be exactly true to say that the average rate on dutiable imports was 134 per cent., but the statement would be as valueless as it would be misleading. Yet the gentleman takes the value of our dutiable imports, $450,325,321, as the basis of his calculation and the duty collected thereon, $212,632,423, and deduces the average ad valorem rate of 47.10 per cent. for 1887.

But if he had added to the dutiable imports the value of goods admitted free of duty, namely, $233,930,659, his aggregate of importations for 1887 would be $683,418,980, which would reduce his average rate to 31 per cent. So the statement that during the last five years, from 1883 to 1887, inclusive, that the average rate on dutiable goods is 44.51 per cent. is true; but if the entire importations are included, the rate will fall to 30 per cent. The same miscalculation destroys the force of his statement that the average rates to-day are heavier than during the war. We have seen that taking our entire imports the average to-day is 31 per cent., while during the war, from 1861 to 1865, the average was 30 per cent. But this average of 1 per cent. higher is attributable largely to lower prices, following the inexorable law that as prices decline the per cent. of ad valorem rates increase. If the value of an imported article be $10, and the duty $1, the equivalent ad valorem rate would be 10 per cent. If the value of the same article should fall to $5, the duty remaining the same, $1, the equivalent ad valorem rate would be 20 per cent. And so the entire statement of the gentleman is not only misleading and fallacious, but ceases to be interesting or instructive. [Applause.]

But special effort has been made and is being persisted in to induce the American farmer to believe that a protective tariff is hostile to his best interest and his prosperity would be promoted by an abandonment of that policy. How far this effort may be successful it is impossible to forecast; but this much may be affirmed with absolute certainty, unless the results of established law are uncertain and experience is no longer a safe guide, that any course which cripples or destroys our manufacturing interests and deprives labor of its employment therein will seriously disturb and impair the prosperity of our agricultural interests. Andrew Jackson was not mistaken when he said:

Upon the success of our manufactures, as the handmaid of agriculture and commerce, depends, in a great measure, the independence of our country.

Among the advantages conferred upon the farmer by our protective tariff is that derived from a direct protection to the products of his farm and the industries incident thereto as shown by the following table:

Wool at 30 cents a pound or less, 10 cents; at over 30 cents a pound, 12 cents. Beef and pork, 1 cent a pound. Hams and bacon, 2 cents a pound. Butter, 4 cents a pound. Lard, 2 cents a pound. Cheese, 4 cents a pound. Grapes, 20 per cent. ad valorem. Wheat, 20 cents a bushel. Oats, 10 cents a bushel. Corn, 10 cents a bushel. Rye, 15 cents a bushel. Barley, 15 cents a bushel. Potatoes, 15 cents a bushel. Hay, $2 a ton. Live animals, 20 per cent. ad valorem. Beeswax, 20 per cent. ad valorem. Vinegar, 10 cents a gallon. Honey, 20 cents a gallon. Fruit, shade, and ornamental trees, shrubs, etc., 20 per cent. ad valorem. All vegetables not otherwise provided for, 10 per cent. ad valorem. Rice, cleaned, 2½ cents per pound. Wheat flour, 20 per cent. ad valorem. Tobacco (unmanufactured) 35 cents per pound. Sugar, 1½ to 3½ cents per pound. Rice flour and rice meal, 20 per cent. ad valorem. Extract of meat, 20 per cent. ad valorem. Barley, pearled or hulled, ½ cent per pound. Barley malt, 20 cents per bushel. Corn meal, 10 cents per bushel. Oat meal, ½ cent per pound. Rye flour, ½ cent per pound. Potato and corn starch, 2 cents per pound. Pickles and sauces not otherwise provided for, 35 per cent. ad valorem. Garden seeds, 20 per cent. ad valorem. Hemp seed, ½ cent per pound. Currants, 1 cent per pound. Apples, 10 per cent. ad valorem. Hops, 8 cents per pound. Milk, preserved or condensed, 20 per cent. ad valorem. Flax, straw, $5 a ton. Flax, not dressed, $20 a ton. Flax, dressed, $40 a ton. Tow of flax or hemp, $10 a ton. Bristles, 15 cents a pound. Tallow, 1 cent a pound. Flax-seed or linseed, 20 cents per bushel.

That the farmer should still further be protected in some of these products there can be no question, and yet it is to be observed that the bill now under consideration strikes down with merciless hand many of the most important agricultural interests of the country by placing them on the free-list. When it is remembered that there was brought into this country last year, exclusive of tea, coffee, and sugar, $57,000,000 of agricultural products in competition with our home interests, the policy proposed by this bill which would still further expose the farmer to foreign competition will not be apt to receive the approval of our agricultural interests. But while this direct protection is of importance to the farmer, the indirect benefits accruing to him from the diversification of our industries are much greater and beyond the possibility of calculation. In this lies the chief advantage. Every farmer tills the soil for a double purpose, first, to supply the necessities for himself and his household, and, secondly, to secure a surplus with which he may obtain those articles of necessity and luxury which can not be produced from the soil.

For the disposition of this surplus he requires a market, and that market which yields the best returns will be to him the most advantageous. There are but two markets open to him, the home market and the foreign. Can it be possible that the farmer can be deluded into a belief that a policy which destroys his home market and forces him into the distant markets of the world with his surplus products, with all the attending and enormous cost of transportation, will redound to his advantage? Every farmer understands that the nearer his market to his farm the more abundant his profits. Therefore, any policy which tends to diversify our industries and give employment to a large class of our people outside of agriculture, and who thus become consumers of the surplus products of the farm at home, must inure to the benefit of the American farmer; and any policy which tends to diminish these industries and force the capital and labor employed therein onto the farm, to become producer rather than consumer, must from necessity increase the agricultural product while at the same time lessening the demand therefor. I can conceive of no calamity more appalling than that which would overtake our vast agricultural interests by the destruction of our manufacturing industries and the consequent annihilation of our home market. The importance to agriculture of a diversification of our industries and consequent creation of a home demand for the surplus product of the farm was strikingly set forth by Alexander Hamilton nearly a century ago.

This idea of an extensive domestic market for the surplus produce of the soil is of the first consequence. It is of all things that which must effectually conduce to a flourishing state of agriculture. To secure such a market there is no other expedient than to promote manufacturing establishments. Manufacturers, who constitute the most numerous class after the cultivators of the land, are for that reason the principal consumers of the surplus of their labor.

But the advantage of such a policy does not rest for its support upon a theory. It is affirmed by experience, and it may be well to again remind the President that "it is a condition that confronts us, not a heory." It is estimated that to-day our population is not less than 60,000,000, of which only 20,000,000 are actually engaged in any gainful occupation, 9,000,000 of whom are engaged in agriculture, leaving 11,000,000 employed in other pursuits. Nine million farmers are feeding a nation of 60,000,000 of people. How does this advantage the farmers? The estimated value of the products of our farms, exclusive of cotton and tobacco, is $3,000,000,000 annually, and yet 94 per cent. of this enormous product is taken in our own market and consumed by our own people. The farmers are compelled to export only 6 per cent. of their products. In this connection it is worthy of note that while the value of our manufactures reaches the almost fabulous sum of $7,000,000,000 annually, yet more than 90 per cent. of this is consumed within our borders. It is estimated that the value of our industrial products of farm and factory will aggregate annually $11,000,000,000, and yet nearly $10,000,000,000 of this is disposed of in our own market and consumed by our own people. And yet, with a home market of such absorbing capacity, built up and sustained by a diversification of our industries, the advocates of free trade are constantly holding up the phantom of the markets of the world as the one thing chiefly to be desired.

Of what value to the American farmer are the markets of the world in comparison with his home market? How much of the farmer's surplus products does the world's market require to-day? Before dropping the substance for the shadow it would be well to inquire the extent of the foreign demand for the products of our farm. If a policy is adopted which destroys the home market and forces the American farmers into the markets of the world, when his vessels are laden with the products of his farm, to what ports on the inhabitable globe will he direct his course? Not to South America, nor Asia, nor Africa, nor Australasia, nor the islands of the sea, for in all these there is practically no demand for our agricultural products, and there is no prospect that there ever will be, for these countries are abundantly supplied with agricultural laborers and surplus lands. Europe is the only country which does not feed its own people, and even there Russia, Germany, Turkey, Roumania, Servia, and Hungary produce their own food supply, and excluding Germany, furnish a surplus for the European markets. Outside of Great Britain, therefore, there is practically no demand for our agricultural products, and with the rich fields of India open to her it is not difficult to discern that the time is not far distant when even this demand will cease.

The chairman of the committee, in his recent speech, declared that—

We are the great agricultural people of the world, and have been feeding the people of Europe, and must receive European goods in exchange or fail to export our surplus, and thus surfeit the home market and reduce prices.

This hallucination of feeding the people of Europe is easily dispelled. As bread is the main staff of European life, let us see where it is obtained. The population of Europe is about 350,000,000, and the consumption of wheat about 3½ bushels per head, of which scarcely more than half a bushel is required from North and South America, Asia, and Australasia. In three-fourths of the entire area of Europe the consumption does not amount to 2 bushels per head, and nearly every grain of that is produced at home. On about half of the area of Europe there is a surplus to spare to the other half. The largest consumer of wheat in the world, France, was also the largest producer less than fifteen years ago, and has now about as large an area and product as ever, and needs of foreign wheat only about 10 per cent. of her supply.

The 80,000,000 people of Russia live mostly on rye, as do the people of Germany and Central Europe, and produce it all themselves. Many of the people of the North of Europe consume a large proportion of maize. Some in the North of Europe subsist largely on oat-meal. The consumption of all cereals in Europe usually averages at least 16 bushels per head, of which 3 pecks per capita come from other continents. Feeding the people of Europe! Four continents combining to supply a per capita deficiency of 3 pecks per capita in the fifth. A failure of one-half peck in this deficiency sends prices rapidly upward; an excess of one-half peck produces an instant and sudden fall in India and Dakota. An additional half bushel would sprout in the bin or be fed to farm animals without a foreign offer. This is so well known that it would be charity to attribute to ignorance the pretense of enlarging the exportation of wheat by low tariffs, or no tariffs, or by any other device short of the creation of a few million more foreign mouths.

If we do so little in feeding Europe with bread, still less do we supply the meat she consumes. Last year we exported 162,000,000 pounds of beef, fresh and salted; 138,000,000, or four-fifths of it, went to Great Britain. Very little is ever wanted elsewhere, and Englishmen are now straining every nerve and spending British gold in enterprises to supply their country with frozen and canned beef from Australia and the Argentines. Of 505,000,000 pounds of bacon, pork, and hams exported, 380,000,000 pounds, or three-fourths of it, went to Great Britain and a part of the remainder to Canada. Scarcely a nation in the world, Great Britain excepted, depends upon foreign nations for its meat supply. It is a necessity of their existence that they should supply themselves. It is the same with cheese, the only other food product of which there is an appreciable deficiency in Europe. Its market is confined chiefly to Great Britain, and exportation can not be enlarged at all without a reduction in price, and any sudden extension is a practical and physical impossibility. The rich there buy all they can eat now, and the poor all they can afford. The requirement is fixed and limited with the least possible element of elasticity, so that the foreign demand can only fluctuate with the annual variations of the home supply. This statement should dispose of the boastful and silly pretense so glibly and frequently made by free-traders, of feeding Europe, and ought to mark the exit of America in the rôle of the world's nurse and caterer to the universe. [Applause.]

Where then on the face of the globe can the American farmer market his surplus? At home or nowhere. This home market, therefore, should be to him the object of his deepest solicitude and protecting care, for upon it the future of agriculture in this country depends. I will submit here a table showing the value of the leading products of American farms in 1886, according to estimates of the Department of Agriculture, together with the amount consumed at home and exported, which demonstrates at a glance the importance of the home over the foreign market.

From this table it will be observed that the American farmer disposes of about 90 per cent., and excluding cotton and tobacco, more than 94 per cent. of his farm products at home, and no amount of sophistry can delude him into the belief that it is for his interest to destroy or lessen this home demand.

His interest lies rather in the direction of an enlargement of our manufacturing industries and a corresponding increase of the number of consumers, that he may ultimately find a home market for the entire product of his farm. Another consideration of incalculable value to the farmer must not be lost sight of, and that is the home market is a permanent and steady one. No business can be profitably prosecuted without some assurance of stability. If the farmer was forced to an entire dependence upon foreign markets for the sale of his products it would be impossible to calculate with any degree of certainty the extent of that demand, dependent as it would be upon the condition of the foreign supply, and the result would be, one year his surplus would find steady and profitable sale and the next perish in his fields. But with a steady market at home, created and sustained by our diversified industries, the demand is steady, and every farmer knows that when he sows he can reap with profit. Another advantage to the American farmer from the establishment and maintenance of manufacturing industries is the enhanced value of his acres. You can not build up anywhere a prosperous manufacturing industry without enhancing the value of the farm lands adjacent thereto. Cast your eye over the map of the Republic and indicate the localities where industries are the most diversified and the fewest people are engaged in agriculture, and there you will find the highest-priced farm lands. Mark the localities where farming is the chief occupation of the people and other industries are the least developed; there you will find farm lands of the least value. To demonstrate the truth of this assertion I will insert a table in which the States and Territories are divided into four groups, in the first of which is embraced that portion of the country having less than 30 per cent. of the people engaged in agriculture; the second, over 30 and less than 50; the third, over 50 and less than 70, and the fourth having 70 per cent. and over engaged in agriculture:

Classes.	Acres.	Value of farms.	Value per acre.	Per cent. in agriculture.
First	77,250,742	$2,985,641,197	$38.65	18
Second	112,321,257	3,430,915,767	30.55	42
Third	237,873,040	3,218,108,970	13.53	58
Fourth	108,656,796	562,430,842	5.18	77

From this table it will be discerned that where 77 per cent. of the people are engaged in agriculture the average value of farm lands is only a trifle over $5 an acre, while where only 18 per cent. are engaged in agriculture farm lands average over $38 per acre. What is true in the country at large is equally true in counties and States. The principal manufacturers in Pennsylvania are to be found in thirteen counties, and the average value of farm land within these counties is $86.73 per acre, while in the remaining counties it is only $42.02. The farm lands in the twelve chief manufacturing counties of Ohio average $67.85 per acre, while in the balance of the State they are worth only $42.46. The farm lands of Ohio, with only 40 per cent. of her people engaged in agriculture, are worth $46 per acre, while in Kentucky, separated only by the Ohio, but with 62 per cent. engaged in agriculture, they are worth only $14 per acre. The rugged land of Pennsylvania, with 21 per cent. of her people engaged in agriculture, is worth $50 per acre, while in Virginia, where 51 per cent. are engaged in agriculture, they are valued at only $11 an acre. By the census of 1880 in the six States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, and Arkansas 77 per cent. of the people were engaged in agriculture and only 5 per cent. in manufactures, and the average value of the farm lands in these six States was only $5.18 per acre.

It is an astounding fact derived from the same census that the value of the 200,000,000 acres of farm lands in the eleven States composing the late Confederacy are not equal to the 26,000,000 acres of farm lands in the States of New York and New Jersey. I beg to assure the gentlemen of the South that I have drawn this contrast in no invidious spirit, but only in confirmation of the fact that the development of manufactures tends to enhance the value of agricultural lands. It seems to me, however, that there is a lesson to be drawn from this of inestimable value to you. The South needs this development. Protection has brought it to the North—it will bring it to you. [Applause.] You have but to accept it and it will bring to you an era of unexampled prosperity. It will open and develop your mines, explore your forests, light the fires of your furnaces, build your factories, construct your railways, invite capital to investment, give employment to your labor, plant cities in your waste places, and lead your people into the highway of industrial progress. [Applause.] You have already entered thereon. During the last ninety days $36,000,000 of capital have gone into your manufacturing industries. In this I rejoice. There is not an industry in the South the development of which would redound to her glory that I would not as jealously guard as though it were the industry of Michigan. I believe in protection not for my State alone but for my country. [Applause.] I believe in American industries, American capital, American labor, against the whole world.

The chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means expresses the hope that this measure will pass. He is not alone in this desire. There is not a member of the Cobden Club or a free-trader in the United States who is not in sympathy with him. More than this, free-trade England stands on tip-toe of expectation and screams with delight. Listen to the voice of her exultation!

[London Times.]

They are no doubt right in believing that, whatever may be said of preserving the essence of the protective system and of ignoring free trade, the tariff can not be reduced to the strict proportions of a revenue corresponding to the limited and diminishing necessities of the Federal Government without admitting a great flood of foreign competition.

[London Saturday Review.]

President Cleveland has devoted himself entirely to the tariff. It is impossible to recast this without touching directly the pockets of every citizen of the United States and indirectly influencing the commercial interests of the world.

[London Spectator.]

The message has struck a blow at American protection.

[The Statist.]

There is hardly a single industry in the United States that is not interested in maintaining protective duties.

[London Post.]

We shall be much mistaken if the effect of this state communication will not be to strengthen considerably the case of free-traders in all parts of the world. It will be regarded as a step in the right direction by all who believe in the soundness of free-trade principles.

[London Standard.]

Free trade becomes at once a living issue.

[London Daily News.]

The stone now set rolling will not stop until it has broken the idol of protection in pieces.

[Glasgow Herald.]

This reads like an extract from some old speech of Mr. Bright's.

[People's Journal, Dundee.]

The change in the American fiscal policy will be beneficial to this country, and the prospect of it has diffused fresh hope throughout the business circles in the city.

[Haddingtonshire Courier, Scotland.]

We may look to an impetus being given to our home trade that will go far to make up for the depression of late years.

[The Scotchman.]

The free importation of iron, coal, and wool would be a great boon to British producers.

[London Times.]

It is to the new world that the Cobden Club is chiefly looking as the most likely sphere for its vigorous foreign policy. It has done what it can in Europe, and it is now turning its eyes westward and bracing itself for the struggle which is to come. It can not rest while the United States are unsubdued.

I hope this bill will not pass. [Loud applause on the Republican side.] It ought not to pass.

Let me warn you, gentlemen of the South, that this measure bodes no good to you. It will arrest the investment of capital in your midst and bring your industries to a stand-still. There is no portion of our country where this measure should meet with a more united and determined opposition than in the South. Untoward circumstances have heretofore retarded her material progress, but the way is now open for her to march unimpeded to a splendid industrial future. The advance is already sounded. He who does not respond to its inspiring summons will soon find himself without a party and without a following. I rejoice that there is a new South, a new industrial South, born of the throes of war, but full of hope and full of courage. [Applause.] She stands to-day with uplifted brow facing the dawn of a mighty future. Her loins are girt for a new race. With unfettered hands she smites the earth, and fountains of unmeasured wealth gush forth. Beneath her feet she feels the stir of a marvelous life. Her pathway is already illumined with the light of blazing furnaces. Her heavens are aglow with the break of a new day. All hail its on-coming!

"Aid its dawning tongue and pen,
Aid it hopes of honest men,
Aid it, paper; aid it, type;
Aid it, for the hour is ripe,
And our earnest must not slacken into play;
Men of thought and men of action clear the way."

And when the sun shall reach the zenith of that glorious day, the North and the South cemented in the indissoluble bonds of commercial and fraternal unity will stand together under the banner of protection to American industries and American labor, and march to grander industrial triumphs. [Great applause.]

Mr. MILLS. I move the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of revenues, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 4365) to authorize the construction of an arsenal for the repair, storage, and distribution of ordnance and ordnance stores for the use of the Government of the United States at Columbia, Tenn.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the bill (H. R. 1761) for the relief of the First National Bank of Portland, Oregon, for money advanced the Oregon Iron Works, the contractor in building the United States revenue-cutter Thomas Corwin, with amendments, asked a conference with the House on the bill and amendments, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. MITCHELL, Mr. SPOONER, and Mr. WILSON of Maryland.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. 218) to change the limit of appropriation for the public building at Key West, Fla.; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval House bill 6908, entitled "An act granting a pension to William P. Witt." The beneficiary named in the bill was enrolled for one hundred days' service on the 13th day of July, 1864, and was mustered out on the 16th day of November in the same year. The record shows that he was reported present on all rolls until he was mustered out. He filed a claim for pension in 1884, alleging that he incurred chronic diarrhea, liver disease, rheumatism, and a disease of the head affecting his hearing during his military service. Two comrades testify to his being sick and being in the hospital to such an extent as to wholly discredit his presence with his company. A physician testifies that he prescribed for him some time in the month of November, 1864, for liver disease and jaundice to which rheumatism supervened, confining him six weeks or more. There seems to be a complete hiatus of any medical or other evidence concerning his physical condition from that time until nearly twenty years thereafter, in July, 1884, when he was examined and it was found that he had impaired hearing in both ears, but no symptoms of rheumatism, and that his liver was normal. Without further detailing particulars, the entire complexion of this case satisfies me that the claimant contracted no pensionable disability during his one hundred days of service.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, April 24, 1888.

On motion of Mr. HOLMAN, the message and the accompanying bill were referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

CHLOE QUIGGLE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following veto message of the President of the United States; which was read, and, on motion of Mr. SPRINGER, referred, with the accompanying bill, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval House bill No. 4530, entitled "An act granting a pension to Chloe Quiggle, widow of Phillip Quiggle."

The husband of the beneficiary named enlisted February 11, 1865, and was discharged September 27, 1865. The records show that he was reported August 31, 1865, as "absent, confined in post prison, at Chattanooga, since August 18, 1865."

He filed a claim for pension June 25, 1880, alleging that after a march from Chattanooga to a point 1½ miles distant and back, he, upon his return, drank some water which produced diarrhea, since which time he had been troubled also with disease of kidneys and rheumatism.

He died in September, 1883, and the claim then pending on his behalf was conpleted by his widow. After a special examination the claim for diarrhea was on the 21st day of April, 1887, allowed from September 28, 1865, to January 1, 1870, when it was shown that any disability from this cause ceased. The claim for disease of kidneys and rheumatism was rejected upon the ground that no such disabilities were shown to be due to military service.

The widow filed a claim on her own behalf August 27, 1883, alleging the death of the soldier from the results of prostration by heat while marching near Nashville, Tenn., and also from disease of kidneys, rheumatism, and chronic diarrhea.

It is reported to me that the evidence taken during a special examination of this case established that before and after enlistment the soldier was addicted to the excessive use of intoxicating liquors.

One physician stated to the examiner that shortly after the soldier's discharge he found him suffering from disease of kidneys and from rheumatism and diarrhea, but that he concluded the disease of the kidneys had been coming on for a year; that it could not have been caused by a sunstroke a few weeks previously, and that the diseases were of longer standing than that.

Another physician, who attended the soldier during his last illness, testified that he did not know that he suffered from any disease until the summer of 1882; that he found him suffering from retention of urine, and that the difficulty rapidly developed into an acute attack of Bright's disease; that no indications of rheumatism were found, but that the disease progressed steadily, and was a well-marked case of Bright's disease of the kidneys. He also testifies that the origin of the disease was no doubt recent, though possibly it might have existed in a low form for some years.

A medical examination in May, 1882, developed no disease of the kidneys. It seems to me that all the reliable testimony in the case tends to show beyond a doubt that the soldier's death was not due to any incident of his military service. I do not find that the medical testimony given by his neighbors makes a suggestion that it was; and upon all the facts I am of the opinion that the pension which has been already allowed was a liberal disposition of the case.

The beneficiary named in this bill is aged, and it would certainly be a gratification to grant her relief. But the question is whether we do well to establish a precedent for the allowance of claims of this character in the distribution of pension funds.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, April 24, 1888.

WILLIAM H. BRIMMER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following veto message of the President of the United States; which was read, and, on motion of Mr. SPRINGER, referred, with the accompanying bill, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval House bill No. 5247, entitled "An act granting a pension to William H. Brimmer."

The beneficiary named in this bill enlisted September 5, 1864, as a wagon-master, and was discharged on the 30th day of May, 1865. There is no record of any disability during his short service.

In February, 1888, nearly twenty-three years after his discharge, he filed an application for a pension, alleging that in the fall of 1864 he was made to carry sacks of corn, which produced a weakness of the walls of the abdomen, resulting in rupture. In an affidavit filed upon said application the claimant testifies that he said nothing about his injury or disability to any one while in the service, and can furnish no evidence except his own statement.

The first and only medical evidence presented touching this claim is that of Dr. Reynolds, who examined him in 1880 or 1881, who then came to the conclusion that the claimant was suffering from an incomplete hernia, which a few months thereafter developed in the right groin. From this examination and testimony no hint is furnished that the injury was due to military service, nor any intimation that it might be.

In February, 1888, a medical examination was made under direction of the Pension Bureau, when it was found that the claimant had the general appearance of being healthy and well nourished, but that he had a small uncomplicated inguinal hernia on the right side, which was easily retained.

I can not believe upon the facts presented that an injury of the character alleged could have been sustained in the service and still permitted the performance of all the duties of wagon-master for months thereafter, remaining undeveloped for so many years, and that there should now be such a lack of testimony connecting it with any incident of military service.

I believe the rejection of this claim was right and just upon its merits.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, April 24, 1888.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the House take a recess until 8 o'clock to-night.

HANNAH C. DE WITT.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, the veto message accompanying one of the bills returned to the House yesterday by the President, the bill granting a pension to Hannah C. De Witt, stated that by some mistake a bill had been twice passed by Congress at the present session in precisely the same form. I find by reference to the RECORD that the bill in question was disposed of in a proper and regular manner at a Friday evening session, the circumstances being these: Two similar bills were introduced—one in the Senate and the other in the House. The Senate bill first passed, came over to the House, and was placed on the Calendar.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I do not see that the gentleman is presenting any question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has stated no question of privilege yet.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I am coming to it.

The House bill was reported by the House committee in regular form, and took its place on the Calendar. At a Friday evening session, when the House bill was reached in regular order, a motion was made that House bill No. 823 be laid on the table and that Senate bill No. 451, similar in substance, be taken up and passed. Such action was taken; the House bill was laid on the table, and the Senate bill passed. The RECORD and the House Journal show these facts clearly. It seems that the House bill (which was tabled), instead of being disposed of under the order of the House, by some error or inadvertence of the Clerk got into the hands of the engrossing committee, was signed by the Speaker, sent over to the Senate, and passed by that body. But that bill was never, in fact, passed by the House, as stated in the message.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the House take a recess until 8 o'clock this evening.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, it is pretty well known to the House and to the community at large that some efforts have been made toward fixing a limit to the debate on the tariff bill, or (speaking more exactly, perhaps) toward naming the time that should be given for debate upon the measure; and there have been some consultations on the part of members of the Committee on Ways and Means on either side. The members on this side, desiring to have a full discussion, had requested that ten days be allowed to them at such times as the bill was up for consideration. After some consultation on one part and the other we parted, because the gentlemen who represented the majority of the House were disposed to consult those whom they represented. This morning it was found that the agreement we hoped would be made was not made.

And I now ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] in open House that we may fix on some time as the extent of this debate. I suggest to him that ten days be allowed on a side, and as many evening sessions as people may be disposed to have be allowed in addition thereto.

I desire to suggest to the House that such discussion for such length of time is well befitting not only the importance and nature of the bill which has been presented, but also the circumstances under which it has been presented. There has been no consideration of the bill and no public hearing on the part of those who are interested; no public hearing on the part of members the interests of whose districts are concerned. There was on our side already on the list the number of men who would fully occupy the time which is suggested, and there are many more, undoubtedly, who would desire to address the House.

Now, it is well known these evening sessions are not really of the nature of discussion; that men do not desire to participate in the evening sessions except under the spur of a necessity which certainly does not now exist. If it should turn out, as it sometimes does, that discussion is not necessary for so long a time, then it will not be necessary to take the number of days suggested, and under such circumstances no more days should be used than actually required to enable members to address the House, and their constituencies through the House, on this important question. And I sincerely hope, the matter being brought to the attention of the whole House, we may have a distinct understanding to the effect which I have suggested.

I am bound to say it has been claimed that the gentlemen on the other side understood that they had an informal agreement with our side as to the night sessions for to-day and to-morrow. Of course, if I had had any such understanding I would never have objected to the evening session as I did, and the responsibility for which I take before the House, and it is proper I should take it, since another gentleman personally made the objection.

I should also say, while it seems to have been understood on the other side that the two nights should be allowed, it was not so understood by any member of the committee on this side. And as to evening sessions, talked of solely with reference to the idea that if the length of time given for debate, which I have suggested, was allowed to us, then we would have no objection to any number of evening sessions the members of the House should desire to have, because we believed in addition to the fifty on our side who have already presented their names there would be a great many more who would like to be heard.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, after what has been said by the gentleman from Maine, it is proper for me to say that the gentleman from Maine and the gentleman from Ohio, who served on the Committee on Ways and Means, and certain gentlemen of the majority had a meeting in which it was understood, not informally, but formally, that an agreement should be made covering the days of Tuesday and Wednesday, with a hope that further negotiations would result in a further agreement covering the whole of the debate.

We distinctly understood it to be a part of that formal agreement that there should be to-day a debate opened by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN], followed by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS], who were to be followed by two gentlemen, one from each side of the House, not members of the Committee on Ways and Means; and also that there should be each day an evening session, at which gentlemen might be able to speak or not as they chose, not to lose their place on the list if they did not desire to do so, and if any member of the Republican side chose to speak at these two evening sessions his time should not be charged in the time which we might hereafter agree upon. On Wednesday the debate, it was understood, should be opened by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM], followed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE], who was not present, but who was seen and said to be ready. And they were to be followed by two gentlemen not members of the committee; and there was then to be an evening session.

This was our understanding, and this morning, when in accordance with the agreement which was the result of our negotiations an evening session was proposed and it was objected to, as I frankly stated to the gentleman from Ohio, I looked upon the agreement between us as having been repudiated.

Now, the ten days the gentlemen of the minority claimed were not ten days only, but were to be, as they expressly specified, ten days of five hours each. Not ten days the House might meet and adjourn, but ten days of five hours each which should be day sessions, not including the evening sessions. It was to that length of time the majority of the Ways and Means Committee did not see their way clear under the circumstances to agree to. I am inclined to the opinion that there would have been no hesitation on the part of the majority of the Ways and Means Committee to have agreed to have given ten days to the gentlemen on the other side with the understanding on both sides there should be night sessions with the intention that the time for debate on each day should be made as long as possible.

As to the reasons suggested by the gentleman from Maine, why there should be given so long time for debate, those probably will be discussed as the debate goes on, and whatever may be said pro and con about them, or whatever may be said by gentlemen on the majority or minority side of that committee concerning what has been done or happened in the committee, are all questions about which I care to submit no observations now. At the proper time, under other circumstances and in other connections, it may seem proper to me to submit some suggestions in regard to them, but not now.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to say, as a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, that I was present at the conference yesterday, and remained until the fact had become apparent that no conclusion or agreement could be reached. The pros and cons had been stated; my colleague from Maine had presented very much the suggestions that he presents now, and I left the committee with a perfect understanding that there was to be consideration of the points that had been made and that the committee would then act. I rested in that conclusion, ready to meet the committee at any time to make any effort for arriving at an agreement; and I had not heard, until I heard it here about the time the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] was closing his speech, that there was any allegation that an agreement had been reached, and that the Republican members of the committee had thereby bound themselves to assent to night sessions on this bill at this early date. I should like before we do go into night sessions that the Committee on Ways and Means should again make an endeavor to determine whether in view of the fact that the minority was excluded from all voice in making up the bill, or in presenting the wishes of their constituents who are interested in it, that the discussion by the House should be deliberate, open, and if possible in the hearing and gaze of the parties interested in the bill represented by Republicans. That can not be the case if we are now to begin with night sessions. I certainly am bound by no such agreement. Twelve o'clock came, and I had been in my committee-room up to that time, when the conclusion seemed to have been reached which did not cover night sessions, at which time I left.

I felt it due to myself to make this suggestion.

Mr. MILLS. I will be very glad, I will say to the members of the Committee on Ways and Means and to the House, to see our colleagues on that committee from the other side of the House with a view if possible to reach some amicable understanding both as to the limit of the general debate on this bill and as to the limit of debate in Committee of the Whole on the bill by its paragraphs. We are disposed to accommodate them just as far as possible.

It is true, as the gentleman from Maine said, that we had some conferences. We met and talked about the debate and failed to make an agreement, except as to the business for to-day and to-morrow. The whole thing was otherwise left open. We are now proceeding with the debate, and it is the desire of the majority that there shall be the amplest time and the fullest discussion of the question on both sides. We propose, gentlemen, to discuss it night and day. The discussion of the bill will go out over the whole country, whether the debate takes place in the day or night. It is not absolutely necessary that we should have the galleries present and daily sessions for that purpose. We have but a limited audience here.

The arguments that gentlemen propose to make will go out to the whole country through the medium of the public press, and this great question is to be determined not by the people of Washington City, but by the mighty constituencies which lie outside of the District of Columbia, and hence there is no just reason for not continuing this discussion at night.

It is now growing late, and I will simply say, for myself and my colleagues on the committee on this side of the House, that we will be glad to meet the minority again to-morrow, and see if we can not come to some amicable understanding. In the mean time I insist on the motion that the House take a recess until 8 o'clock.

Mr. MCKINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I think, as I am a member of the Ways and Means Committee who was in conference with our colleagues upon the other side touching this matter, that it is proper for me to say a word upon this question. It seemed to be the desire yesterday morning upon the part of the majority of the committee that there should be an understanding between the majority and minority as to the conduct of this debate and the final vote upon the bill.

The minority, or a part at least, met with the majority of the committee; and my understanding of that interview was that to-day and to-morrow were to be consumed in general debate upon the bill, and it was the expectation of the majority of the committee that before to-morrow they would be able to determine with us the duration of the general debate. I did not understand that we gave our consent to a night session to-night and to-morrow night; but when I was assured by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] and other gentlemen of the majority side of the committee that it was their understanding that we had consented to that arrangement—at least the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] and myself—I stated to the gentleman from Kentucky to-day that if such was the understanding of himself and his colleagues, I would yield, so far as I was individually concerned, in the interest of good feeling in the Committee on Ways and Means.

But, Mr. Speaker, I want to say this: that when I gave my consent to these night sessions—to-night and to-morrow—for general debate, I did not undertake to speak for or bind any gentleman on this side of the House. I was speaking for myself only, and was only intending that, so far as I could, I would advise my friends on the minority of the Committee on Ways and Means to yield their assent to such an arrangement as the majority of the committee desired, believing they would do whatever was proper under the circumstances. And it being stated here to-day that the understanding was that we were to have a session to-night and to-morrow, I am perfectly willing, in the interest of good feeling and that the debate may be conducted properly, to advise my Republican colleagues to consent to that arrangement.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman from Ohio allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MCKINLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. To insure a full attendance to-night, if we have a session, can we receive the assurance that there will be one or two speeches on a side made by members of the committee?

Mr. MCKINLEY. It was distinctly stated that at the night sessions no gentleman on our side would be required to speak. The gentleman from Kentucky states so now.

Mr. MILLS. But any gentleman on that side can speak at the night session if he desires to do so.

Mr. MCKINLEY. And, as the gentleman from Kentucky said, the time to be occupied to-night was not to come out of the time allowed for debate.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Is the holding of a night session to be a reason for abridging the time allowed for debate?

Mr. MCKINLEY. On the contrary, I was informed by the gentlemen forming the majority of the committee that evening sessions if held would not abridge at all the time allowed us for debate.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I should like the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] to hear the statement just made by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. MCKINLEY. I will repeat it. I understood from the gentleman from Kentucky if the two night sessions were held that was not to constitute an abridgment of the time for general debate which we might hereafter agree upon.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. My understanding of the agreement made with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCKINLEY] and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] was that we would have these night sessions with the understanding that if the gentlemen of the Republican party did not desire to speak they were not to lose their places on the roster. And if any gentlemen on the Republican side did speak at the night sessions the time they occupied was not to be charged on any agreement we might be able to reach.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. So that these night sessions are not in any way to lessen the time for general debate?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. They are not to be taken out of any agreement we may come to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] moves that the House take a recess until 8 o'clock this evening.

Mr. DUNHAM. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question being put on Mr. DUNHAM'S motion to adjourn, there were—ayes 57, noes 92.

Mr. DUNHAM. I call for the yeas and nays.

On the question of ordering the yeas and nays there were ayes 25—not one-fifth of the last vote.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered, and the House refused to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The question is now on the motion to take a recess.

The question being put, there were—ayes 116, noes 2.

Mr. DUNHAM. No quorum.

Mr. MILLS. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. DUNHAM. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The House is now taking a vote, and the motion to adjourn is not in order until this vote is taken. No business has intervened since the former motion to adjourn.

Mr. MILLS. In place of calling for the yeas and nays at this time I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The SPEAKER appointed as tellers Mr. MILLS and Mr. DUNHAM.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 123, no 1.

Mr. DUNHAM. No quorum.

Mr. MILLS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DUNHAM. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas that the House take a recess until 8 o'clock this evening; on which question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 131, nays 13, not voting 180; as follows:

YEAS—131.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed to the immediate consideration of the bill just reported by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed now to the consideration of the bill reported by the Senator from Missouri. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and will be read.

Mr. VEST. It seems to me that it would be an unnecessary waste of time to read the amendment. This is a House bill which is identical with the Senate bill 1498, except as to one single section, and the amendment is the Senate bill with that section added, so that the Senate can understand the whole matter. We have passed the Senate bill, sent it to the House, recalled it, and now we amend the House bill by striking out all after the enacting clause and substituting the Senate bill. We want a committee of conference, and that is the whole object of the Senator from Minnesota. So it is a waste of time to read the whole of the House bill. It is the same bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What course does the Senator from Missouri suggest?

Mr. VEST. I suggest to simply read the House bill with the additional section, section 5.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair apprehends that there will be confusion about the Journal entries unless some change is made in the report of the committee. It appears by the indorsement on House bill 7348, to be to amend by striking out all after the enacting clause and to insert Senate bill 1498.

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir. Perhaps we shall have to go through with the reading.

Mr. HARRIS. That is necessary. The bill will have to be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senate bill 1498 will then be read as an amendment.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I ask the Senator from Minnesota to allow the committees to finish their reports, that having been the last order, before we proceed with the consideration of the bill. It will only take a few minutes, and we shall soon get to the regular order on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia rises to morning business.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1169) for the relief of Commander George M. Bache, United States Navy (retired), reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. STANFORD, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1508) to relieve certain appointed or enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps from the charge of desertion, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 130) to remove the charge of desertion from the record of Christopher Germer, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. PLUMB, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to whom was referred the bill (S. 784) to enlarge the powers and duties of the Department of Agriculture, reported it without amendment.

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5249) granting an increase of pension to Charles H. Smith, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House insisted upon its amendment to the bill (S. 300) granting a pension to Mrs. Juliet G. Howe, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. CHIPMAN, Mr. FRENCH, and Mr. MORRILL managers at the conference on its part.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. 19) for the relief of H. B. Wilson, administrator of the estate of William Tinder, deceased;
A bill (H. R. 807) for the relief of Horatio R. Maryman;
A bill (H. R. 1805) for a public building at Greenville, S. C.;
A bill (H. R. 3253) appropriating the sum of $52,000 for the enlargement and improvement of the United States Government building at Charleston, W. Va.;
A bill (H. R. 4106) granting a pension to Olive Wallace;
A bill (H. R. 4110) granting a pension to Mehitable Wheelock;
A bill (H. R. 4534) for the relief of Emily G. Mills;
A bill (H. R. 4672) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Emily M. Wyman;
A bill (H. R. 5118) granting a pension to Theodore Gardner;
A bill (H. R. 5233) granting a pension to William F. Randolph;
A bill (H. R. 6759) granting a pension to Mary Robinson; and A bill (H. R. 6812) granting an increase of pension to Stephen Thurston.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MANDERSON introduced a bill (S. 2780) to authorize the construction of a bridge over the Missouri River at or near the city of Omaha, Nebr.; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2781) providing for the establishment of a bureau of public documents; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. HISCOCK introduced a bill (S. 2782) granting a pension to Charity J. Towns and minor children; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PUGH introduced a bill (S. 2783) for the relief of the sureties of George W. Hook, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. FAULKNER introduced a bill (S. 2784) for the relief of Edith O'Donnell and others; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SHERMAN introduced a bill (S. 2785) granting a pension to Lewis Edwards; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GIBSON introduced a bill (S. 2786) for the relief of Louis Charles Perret; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. McPHERSON introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 76) authorizing the Secretary of War to purchase a suitable site for testing heavy ordnance and making experiments in gunnery, and to lease a portion of the lands at Sandy Hook not required for Government purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

OPIUM SMUGGLING.

Mr. MITCHELL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to the Senate full copies of the following reports and all affidavits and other evidence attached thereto or transmitted therewith, made to his Department in reference to the alleged smuggling of opium into the United States from British Columbia, to wit: A report made by Special Agent Herbert F. Beecher on or about January 6, last; a report of Special Agent George R. Tingle, made on or about April 5, instant, including the report attached thereto, if any, of William H. White, United States attorney for Washington Territory.

INDIAN DEPREDATION CLAIMS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there are no further resolutions, concurrent or other, the order of morning business is closed, and, pursuant to the agreement of yesterday, the Chair lays before the Senate the bill (S. 1430) to forfeit certain lands heretofore granted for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes.

Mr. MITCHELL. On the 11th of April I submitted a resolution which was laid on the table. I do not know whether it would come up now as morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Resolutions which have been laid on the table must be called up on motion.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask the Senator from Kansas to yield to me one moment. I think the resolution can be passed without any discussion. If it leads to any discussion I shall not insist upon it.

Mr. PLUMB. Very well.

Mr. MITCHELL. I then move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed to the consideration of a resolution heretofore submitted by him. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution submitted by Mr. MITCHELL April 11, 1888, as follows:

Resolved, That a select committee of seven Senators be appointed, to be designated by the President pro tempore of the Senate, for the purpose of taking jurisdiction of and inquiring into and reporting upon claims of individuals presented to the Senate for compensation and damages sustained on account of Indian depredations.

Mr. PLUMB. I think that ought to go over.

Mr. MITCHELL. It has gone over once.

Mr. PLUMB. I meant to say that I doubt the propriety of adopting it, and I think before it is adopted there ought to be some considerable discussion as to the present status of the Indian claims and so on, and an exact determination after the discussion of what is proper to be done.

Mr. MITCHELL. That being the Senator's opinion, of course the resolution will go over to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie on the table.

Mr. MITCHELL. I shall call it up at an early day.

RED RIVER BRIDGES.

Mr. DAVIS. I now renew my request that the Senate proceed, by unanimous consent, to the consideration of House bill 7348, which was reported by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] yield the floor for the purpose indicated by the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. VOORHEES. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Kansas to the notice I gave day before yesterday that at the close of the morning business to-day, if the Senate would oblige me, I should like to call up the resolution of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], now on the table, in order to submit some remarks. I make that statement so as to apprise the Senator with regard to any business he may have in hand.

Mr. PLUMB. I had not observed the statement made by the Senator from Indiana day before yesterday, but of course that has precedence, I believe, according to the unwritten law of the Senate. I will only say that at the expiration of the Senator's remarks I shall ask the Senate to continue the consideration of the bill which I have in charge.

Mr. VOORHEES. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS] to dispose of the matter which he desires.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senate bill 1430 is then laid aside temporarily.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7348) granting to the city of Grand Forks, Dak., the right to build two free bridges across Red River.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill; which was reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the city of Grand Forks, a municipal corporation organized under the laws of the Territory of Dakota, be, and the same is hereby, authorized by its proper officers to construct and maintain either one or two bridges and approaches thereto over the Red River of the North, at the most accessible points within said city, across said river to the most convenient point or points in the State of Minnesota. Said bridge or bridges shall be constructed to provide for the free passage of wagons and vehicles of all kinds, for the transit of animals, for foot passengers, and for such street railways as may be authorized by the city of Grand Forks to be constructed over the same.

SEC. 2. That any bridge built under this act and subject to its limitations shall be a lawful structure, and shall be recognized as a post-route and shall enjoy the rights and privileges of other post-roads in the United States: Provided, That the United States may construct a postal telegraph over said bridge or bridges without charge therefor.

SEC. 3. That any bridge built under this act shall be constructed as a pivot draw-bridge, with a draw over the main channel at an accessible and the best navigable point, and with draw-spans giving a clear water way, measured at the lowest stage of water known at the locality, of not less than 80 feet in the clear on each side of the central or pivot pier; and the clear width, as herein provided for, shall not be reduced by deposits of riprap or by other material about the piers and abutments; and the spans shall not be of less elevation than 3 feet above extreme high-water mark, as known at the point of location, measured to the lowest part of the superstructure of said bridge; and provision shall be made in the location and construction of the abutments and approaches to allow the free passage of flood-water; and the piers of said bridge shall be parallel to, and the bridge itself at right angles to the direction of the current of said stream: Provided also, That the said draw or draws shall be opened promptly by said corporation, upon reasonable signal, for the passage of boats, and said city shall maintain, at its own expense, such lights or other signals thereon as the Light-House Board may prescribe, and said city shall provide at its own expense such sheer-booms, guide-piers, or other device as may be at any time deemed necessary by the Secretary of War to facilitate the safe passage of boats or other water-craft through the spans of said bridge. No bridge shall be erected or maintained under authority of this act which shall at any time substantially or materially obstruct the free navigation of said river; and if any bridge erected under such authority shall, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, obstruct said navigation, he is hereby authorized to cause such change or alteration of said bridge to be made as will effectually obviate such obstruction, at the expense of said city of Grand Forks, and in case of any litigation arising from any obstruction, or alleged obstruction, to the free navigation of said river, caused, or alleged to be caused, by said bridges, or either, the case may be brought in the circuit court of the United States of the district in which said obstruction or bridges are located: Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to repeal or modify any of the provisions of law now existing in reference to the protection of the navigation of rivers, or to exempt any bridge or bridges constructed by virtue hereof from the operations of the same.

SEC. 4. That any bridge or bridges authorized to be constructed under this act shall be built and located under and subject to such regulations for the security of navigation of said river as the Secretary of War shall prescribe; and to secure that object the said corporation shall submit to the Secretary of War, for his examination and approval, designs and drawings of the proposed bridges and a map of the location, giving, for the space of 1 mile above and 1 mile below the proposed locations, the topography of the banks of the river, the shore-lines at high and low water, the direction and strength of the currents at all stages, and the surroundings, accurately showing the bed of the stream, the location of any other bridges, and shall furnish such other information as may be required for a full and satisfactory understanding of the subject; and until the said plans and locations, or either of them, are approved by the Secretary of War there shall not be any bridge built at said point; and should any change be made in the plan of said bridge or bridges during the progress of construction, such change shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of War.

SEC. 5. That the said city of Grand Forks, in the Territory of Dakota, is hereby authorized and empowered to issue in due form its municipal bonds to an amount not exceeding $50,000, payable in twenty years, with interest at 7 per cent. annually, at said city's depository in Grand Forks, Dak., for the purpose of defraying the necessary expenses, in whole or in part, for the erection of said bridge or bridges, and all acts or parts of acts of Congress or the Legislative Assembly of said Territory of Dakota heretofore passed in conflict with this section be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

SEC. 6. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved, and the right to require any changes in such structure or structures, or the entire removal thereof, at the expense of the owners, whenever Congress shall decide that the public interest requires it, is also expressly reserved.

SEC. 7. That this act shall be null and void if actual construction of the bridges herein authorized be not commenced within one year, and completed within three years, from the date thereof.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the action of the Senate on the bill (S. 1498) granting to the city of Grand Forks, Dak., the right to build two free bridges at said city across the Red River will be reconsidered and the bill indefinitely postponed.

Mr. DAVIS. I move that the Senate insist on its amendment to House bill 7348, and ask a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. VEST, Mr. SAWYER, and Mr. DAVIS were appointed.

JOHN C. ADAMS.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Will the Senator from Indiana yield to me to ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to take up House bill 3617?

Mr. VOORHEES. I yield for that purpose. I understand it is a very brief matter.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Yes; it will only take a minute. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3617) for the relief of John C. Adams, administrator of Joseph Adams, deceased.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, in line 7, before the word "dollars" to strike out "8,747" and insert "4,435," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to John C. Adams, administrator of the estate of Joseph Adams, deceased, the sum of $4,435, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for stores and supplies taken by and furnished to the Army of the United States during the late rebellion.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

PRESIDENT'S ANNUAL MESSAGE.

Mr. VOORHEES. I ask that the resolution of the Senator from Ohio be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana asks that the Senate proceed to the consideration of a resolution which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution submitted by Mr. SHERMAN, December 19, 1887, as follows:

Resolved, That the President's annual message be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is before the Senate, and the question is on agreeing to it.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, political parties can only reach their full strength and maturity as the offspring of free institutions, and wherever in human history freedom to speak, write, and publish has been secured, there the world's thinkers on politics, as well as upon religion, science, and philosophy, have associated themselves together, according to their agreements, and for good or for evil, for progress or reaction, for light or for darkness, have shaped and fashioned civilizations and the destinies of nations. They create the issues, those conflicts of ideas, those collisions of thought which are at last, and necessarily, submitted to the judgment and decision of the people whose most vital concerns are embraced and controlled by them. Wherever the contests, agitations, and discussions of parties have not existed in the conduct of human affairs, there will be found periods of inaction, as stagnant and waveless as the Dead Sea, and as barren of advancement as its desolate shores are of vegetable growth.

I have been led to indulge in these general reflections by considering the issues which the two great political parties of this country will present to the American people for decision at the ballot-box in November next. It was Jefferson, the wisest amongst statesmen of his own or any other age, who said that error could be tolerated, and was not to be feared, as long as truth was left free to combat it, and upon this principle the pernicious ideas and dangerous policies now maintained by the Republican party may be looked upon without apprehension, and indeed welcomed into the great arena of debate. The reason and the instincts of the people can be trusted, and by the time the sober suns of autumn are over our heads they will behold with clear, unclouded vision the pathway of duty, justice, and right.

STATEMENT OF THE TARIFF ISSUE.

Sir, let us for a brief space take up the issues to which the Republican party is committed, and on which it seeks to be sustained by popular favor. They are already clearly disclosed, and plainly in view. An extensive discussion of the tariff, here and elsewhere, leaves no doubt as to the attitude of the leaders of the Republican party on that question. They have at last been forced to throw away masks and false faces and to openly avow the doctrine that taxation is not to stop at the revenue line for the support of the Government, but that it may, and shall be, turned loose without limit and without muzzle upon the labor of the people, and upon all the productions of labor, for the sole purpose of enriching and aggrandizing a privileged class, a favored few, a syndicate of devouring, insatiate monopolists. When I addressed the Senate in January last on this subject I could hardly conceive it possible that even the cormorant greed of the monopolists, and the helpless infatuation of their henchmen in Congress, and in control of the Republican press, would lead an intelligent party to assume a position so monstrous, so utterly at war with every principle of human equality and human freedom.

With the Treasury filled to overflowing with money not needed for the expenses of the Government, with millions and tens of millions still pouring in, and all drawn from the weary hands of labor, and all of it sorely needed at home, away from here, in the channels of trade, and in meeting the daily wants of the people; with all this, and more, presented squarely and beyond question to their view, it would seem an act of political madness, suicide, hari-kari, for party leaders of sound minds to go before the American people opposing every reduction of taxes except the taxes now paid by tobacco and alcoholic spirits. I think I remember a sort of poetic effusion some time ago on this floor from the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], in describing the daily laborer smoking his untaxed, cheap tobacco, but nothing was said by that Senator in regard to the overtaxed, high-priced woolen shirt and trousers which that laborer had been compelled to buy from some great, profit-gathering monopolizer of trade in woolen goods.

I do not intend that this issue shall be dodged or evaded in the coming canvass; at least not in Indiana. When the intelligent voters of that great Commonwealth distinctly understand that they pay a tax of 45 per cent. on their plowshares and on all their farming utensils they will not be consoled by the assurance of the Senator from Ohio that they can fill their pipes with tobacco and their glasses with whisky without paying any tax at all. Cheap whisky, cheap beer, and cheap tobacco will not conduce to their peace of mind while they know they are paying a tax of 83 per cent. on salt, 80 per cent. on sugar, and 72 per cent. on flannels. They will decide by a large majority that the pruning-knife of tariff revision must first be used in lopping off such enormous duties now laid by the policy of the Republican party on the absolute necessities of life. It is well known that I am no free-trader, and that in collecting a sufficient revenue for the expenses of the Government I would so adjust the tariff as to give all the protection possible to the interests of labor; but will any one have the hardihood to say that the present system is one of protection to the laboring men and women of the United States?

When was the condition of the working masses more deplorable than at this time? The legislation of the Republican party on the subject of the tariff has been dominant for the last quarter of a century, and remains so now. Under and by virtue of this legislation fortunes of the most gigantic and colossal proportions have been amassed by the favored few, while the condition of the wage-workers, the daily laborers in shop, factory, and mine, has been, and is now, a constant struggle for a bare subsistence, accumulating nothing from year to year, and half the time resisting the tyranny of their employers by strikes and other measures of self-defense. What answer can be made on this point? Sir, at this very hour the struggle of labor against the exactions and oppressions of the strong and pampered monopolies of the country is by far the most important feature in our public affairs. The relations between labor and capital are more unsettled in the United States than in any other government in the world, and constitute the most formidable problem of the present day. While these Halls are vocal from day to day, and from week to week, with eulogies on the protection afforded to labor by the present tariff, yet the hard, clear, bold, determined fact that labor has no protection at all under the present system of tariff taxation confronts each successive speaker, and mocks, derides, and stares him out of countenance.

While we are listening here on this floor to well-rounded periods poured forth as a perpetual chant of laudation to our present tariff laws as the sheet-anchor of protection, safety, and happiness for American labor, the laborers themselves are filling the whole country with the uproar of their strikes, revolts, and resistance against the iniquities of a system which compels them to pay double value for everything consumed by themselves and their families, and to pay, not to the Government, but to the monopolizer of trade, and to swell his enormous profits, while the monopolizer, as an employer, can and constantly does diminish the laborer's wages, and force him to work at low rates or starve. The situation at this time, as presented by the Republican party on its tariff issue, would be absolutely and supremely ridiculous were it not for the fact that human suffering inflicted by intelligent wickedness and conscious crime never can become a subject other than painful and distressing.

Under the highest tariff rates ever known in this country there came the panic of 1873, which for five years crushed and cursed the interests of labor to an extent never before known in the same length of time in the history of the world. And now with tariff taxes but little, if any, reduced, we have the authority of the United States Commissioner of Labor, Carroll D. Wright, that in 1885–'86 the number of strikes and lockouts, the number of unemployed, the resulting money loss to capital and labor, especially in the States where industries are largely protected, has been unprecedented. The truth is, a close look into the workings of the Republican tariff, as illustrated by the naked facts transpiring around us every day, plainly discloses that the meat of what is styled the protective system has thus far been all devoured by the manufacturing monopolists, while the bones, scraped clean, and with all the marrow sucked out, have been thrown to the working classes. This system, when watched closely in its practical operations, will be found to scatter not even the crumbs that fall from the tables of the rich among the toiling millions. Labor has no share in the wealth it creates, and no protection against the tyranny of reduced wages at its employer's unrestrained will and pleasure. While the legislation of the country remains in this shape the laboring masses have the same protection against the greed and exactions of capital that unsheltered, unherded sheep have against wolves, and no more. The position of the Republican party on the tariff issue may therefore be fairly stated as follows:

First. Taxation not limited by the expenses of the Government, but levied indefinitely with a view to the protection of manufacturing monopolies from rivalries in trade, which would cheapen what they have to sell.

Second. All the protection given, and all its profits to inure to the further enrichment of capitalists who employ labor, and not a dollar of it to go to the laboring men and women of the United States.

Third. If any reduction of taxes is to take place, it must be on alcoholic liquors and tobacco and not on the prime necessaries of life.

THE PENSION ISSUE.

Leaving the leaders of the Republican organization to reconcile these propositions as best they can with their professed devotion to American labor, I shall turn next, in the order of what I have to say on this occasion, to another false and fraudulent issue already vehemently promulgated and well under way on its partisan travels. The shameless and brazen effort to pervert the noble question of pensions to the base uses of party success, and that, too, by the willful and deliberate misstatement of history and the wholesale and brutal defamation of the Democratic party and of Democratic soldiers, calls for explicit attention and candid review on the part of every fair-minded man. If the Democratic party has failed in its duty to those who staked their lives on the integrity of this Union let it stand condemned in history; but if, on the contrary, the Republican party is responsible for every evil justly complained of in our pension laws, and has made a mean and parsimonious record towards the soldiers while bestowing munificent millions on corporations, bondholders, and monopolists generally, then and in that case no amount of audacity and mendacity combined will avail to cover up the facts and save the leaders of that party from the overwhelming contempt and execration of the American people.

Sir, no one can question the fact that rank and bitter injustice has been done to the soldier by various provisions of law on the subject of pensions. I have always held, and hold now, and shall hold with my dying breath that by every rule of legal justice and moral equity known to honest consciences the pension of the soldier should have commenced at the self-same hour when his disability in the service of his country occurred, and to his widow and children at the time of his death. When I entered this body in the Forty-fifth Congress, now more than ten years ago, I found this high rule of right totally denied on our statute-books, and a limitation put upon the soldier's right to a pension by fixing a long subsequent time when it should begin. Who is responsible for the odious statute of limitations on arrears of pensions?

It became a law in March, 1862. The Republican party was in the ascendant in every department of the Government, and that law was enacted by a Congress more than two-thirds Republican in both branches, and was approved and signed by a Republican President. And when in January and February, 1879, a great step was taken towards paying all arrears of pensions, yet the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS], in his extraordinary speech of March 6, on this floor, admits that he, as chairman of the Pension Committee at that time, consented to the insertion of the compromise date of July 1, 1880, requiring all applicants for pensions to file their papers prior to that arbitrary date or be forever barred of all arrearages. It is this limitation of which the soldier now complains, and it, too, like the original law, is of Republican origin and enactment. Every evil and unjust principle to be found in our pension legislation was placed there by the very men who now rail loudest against the Democratic party for its alleged hostility to the soldier.

Take the instance of the recruit who was examined carefully by Government surgeons and pronounced sound and healthy when he entered the Army. Can there be anything baser or more dishonest in the legislation of this or any other country than the law by which the Government is allowed to ransack neighborhoods, counties, and States to prove that the official certificates of its own legal authorities were false; to prove that while the enlisted man was decided to be sound enough to do battle for one, two, three, or four years, yet too unsound at the time of his enlistment and throughout the war to be entitled to a pension when the war is over? A transaction of this kind between individuals would entitle the one repudiating his certificate of the facts and his solemn obligations arising from them to a suit of striped clothes in the penitentiary; and the guilt of the Government is still greater. And where did this abominable feature of legislation come from? Who were its authors? The records make answer. It was framed and fashioned in committee and enacted into a law by those who with venomous tongues now most loudly slander the Democratic party as the enemy of Union soldiers.

It has always been thought that the wolf who discussed the subject of muddy water with the lamb as told by Æsop was about as unfair a knave as ever engaged in debate; but it occurs to me if that wolf could hear a modern Republican speech assailing the Democratic party on the subject of pensions, he would feel his great inferiority in the art of making false issues and would catch many new points by which the more speedily to put the lamb in the wrong, and devour him.

Sir—

And why beholdest thou the mote that is in thy brother's eye, but considerest not the beam that is in thine own eye?

Or how wilt thou say to thy brother, Let me pull out the mote out of thine eye; and, behold, a beam is in thine own eye?

Thou hypocrite, first cast out the beam out of thine own eye, and then shalt thou see clearly to cast out the mote out of thy brother's eye.

These words fell from the lips of One who spoke as never man spoke, and they apply as forcibly now to those who charge their own sins on others as they did to the canting Pharisees of Jerusalem nearly nineteen hundred years ago. The Senator from Kansas had the exceeding hardihood to cry out on this floor as follows:

There never is an occasion when an attempt is made to pass a pension bill for the surviving soldiers of the Union armies that every Democrat does not put on his spectacles, go to the blackboard, and take the crayon and say: "It is going to cost too much." * * * The Democratic party do not like them (the soldiers); they never did.

I will not violate the rules of this high body by denouncing such a statement as it might be properly denounced elsewhere, but I can and will proceed in a parliamentary manner to prove it to be utterly and notoriously false. I will not pause to speak of my own services on the Committee on Pensions and on this floor, and to spurn as I might the charge that I, as well as every other Democrat, have declared that every pension bill was going to cost too much and figured to cut it down; but I will appeal to the record made by the party to which I am proud to belong, since its advent to power, and by the facts there disclosed the Senator from Kansas shall stand convicted of bearing false witness against his neighbors. Acts, not words, are the true test of friendship.

I will compare the acts of the Democratic party with what the Republican party has done for the soldier. I will not compare mere words, but deeds. During the fiscal years of 1882, 1883, and 1884, under the administration of Colonel Dudley, there were 100,018 original pension claims allowed. During the years of 1886, 1887, and nine months of the present fiscal year ending April 1, being three months short of three years, General Black has allowed original pension claims to the number of 135,715, being an increase of 35,697 allowances over his Republican predecessor, and in three months' less time. The official figures also show that during the six years preceding June 30, 1885, the monthly average number of claims allowed by the Republican administration of the Pension Office was 2,537, while for the last two years and nine months the monthly average of allowances under a Democratic administration has reached 4,415, an increased average per month of 1,878 over anything ever done by the Republican party in the business of granting original pensions. But suppose we go still further and consider all classes of work in the Pension Bureau, as well as the allowance of original claims. If we examine the records of the years 1883, 1884, and 1885, and for which the Republican party is responsible, we find the following facts:

FISCAL YEAR 1883.

Claims admitted and certificates issued:
Original	38,162
Increase	22,746
Restoration, reissue, etc	796

FISCAL YEAR 1884.

Claims admitted and certificates issued:
Original	34,182
Increase	22,517
Restoration, reissue, etc	1,221

FISCAL YEAR 1885.

Claims admitted and certificates issued:
Original	35,767
Increase	33,975
Restoration, reissue, etc	1,855

This table of figures shows that in three years the Republican administration admitted a total of 191,211 pension claims of all kinds. But what do we discover when we turn to the records of the two years and nine months of Democratic responsibility on the same subject? I am now looking where it could be found, if anywhere, for evidence of Democratic enmity to the Union soldier. Instead, however, of finding proof of such a charge, I simply find ample and overwhelming proof of an enormous slander. Here is the showing under the present administration of the Pension Office:

FISCAL YEAR 1886.

Claims admitted and certificates issued:
Original	40,857
Increase	113,271
Restoration, reissue, etc	2,229
Total	156,357

FISCAL YEAR 1887.

Claims admitted and certificates issued:
Original	55,194
Increase	32,107
Restoration, reissue, etc	2,707
Total	90,008

FISCAL YEAR 1888 (NINE MONTHS ENDING APRIL 1).

Claims admitted and certificates issued:
Original	39,664
Increase	32,028
Restoration, reissue, etc	11,583
Total	83,275
Grand total claims admitted for the two years and nine months under General Black	329,640

Sir, here is an increase of claims of all classes admitted and certificates issued in thirty-three months of the present administration over the thirty-six preceding months of 138,429; or, to state it differently, we find that the present administration in its two years and nine months' service admitted and issued 3,678 certificates more for each month to the soldiers of the country and their widows than was issued by its predecessor for the same period of time.

But, pursuing these comparative statistics into other branches of the pension work, I submit that the following table showing the disbursement of funds to pensioners for the past six years also refutes the indecent clamor of the enemies of the present administration, and is a matter of just pride to its friends:

DUDLEY.

Fiscal year 1883	$60,431,972
Fiscal year 1884	57,273,536
Fiscal year 1885	65,693,706
Total disbursement for three years	$183,399,215

BLACK.

Fiscal year 1886	64,584,270
Fiscal year 1887	74,815,486
Fiscal year 1888 (low estimate)	77,000,000
Total disbursement for three years	216,399,756
Increase in disbursements on account of pensions for the past three years over the preceding three years	33,000,540

The records also show that the annual value of pensions was $110.36 at the time the present administration came into power, since which time the value has been increased $19.74, making the total value in the year 1887, $130.74.

Sir, in the light of such an exhibit as this it would seem that the charge of hostility on the part of the Democratic party to the soldiers of the country would palsy the lips that uttered it. There are some things so self-evident as not to admit of argument or illustration, and the mendacity of such an accusation is one of them.

This annually-increased stream of money flowing constantly into the hands of the soldier and his widow has not only been ordered and directed in its course by the Democratic party, but the large sums needed have been voted in the general appropriations in every instance, and without a murmur, by those who wore the gray and fought like brave men while the war lasted, and who have borne themselves as true and faithful citizens of the Union since they laid down their arms. It is difficult to conceive a nobler spectacle than has been presented all the time by the Southern people and their representatives on this great subject. They have accepted the conditions and incidents of defeat in the field with a manliness and an uncomplaining fortitude which challenge the admiration of the world and constitute a lofty rebuke to their defamers.

But again in regard to what is shown by the record.

From the reports of the work of special pension examiners in the field we find that for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1884, 1885, 1886, and 1887 the following state of facts:

DUDLEY.

For 1884:	Examiners in the field	351
	Cases investigated	7,452
	Reports made	2,187
	Depositions taken	18,484

For 1885:	Examiners in the field	308
	Cases investigated	9,831
	Reports made	29,224
	Depositions taken	189,743
	Credibility reports	23,623

Expense account, $514,269.18. Of this sum $343,551 was charged as traveling expenses. Average cost of investigating, $52.31 per case.

BLACK.

For 1886:	Examiners in the field	277
	Cases investigated	12,715
	Reports made	29,395
	Depositions taken	171,380
	Credibility reports	23,246
For 1887:	Examiners in the field	253
	Cases investigated	31,010
	Reports made	26,399
	Depositions taken	140,544
	Credibility reports	33,192

Total expenses, $427,401; of which sum $153,180.20 was charged as traveling expenses. Average cost of investigating, $13.78 per case.

And now, sir, in order to give full emphasis to the foregoing statements it is only necessary to add that all this grand work has been done with an average of 123 less force in the last fiscal year than in the last year of Dudley's administration, and that General Black in 1887 covered into the Treasury $132,223.04 saved out of his appropriation on account of clerical hire, stationery, and other items of expense which had been abolished.

If we turn at this point from the splendid administration of the Pension Office to the halls of legislation, we may cite the act of August 4, 1886, approved by President Cleveland, increasing the pensions of 10,030 maimed soldiers from $24 to $30, from $30 to $36, and from $37.50 to $45 per month, and the act of March 19, 1886, increasing from $8 to $12 per month the pensions of 79,989 widows and dependents, as acts of justice to these worthy beneficiaries of a grateful country.

General Black's administration, be it also remembered, issued these 79,989 certificates, in addition to the work already stated, in the short space of three months, and without one cent of expense to the pensioners.

But in the very face of these solid and unassailable facts, demonstrating beyond all possible contradiction the magnificent work accomplished for the soldiers by the executive department of the Government under a Democratic administration, torrents of abuse and calumny have been poured upon the head of the Executive himself, charging a personal hostility on his part to those who defended their country in the Union armies. General Grant vetoed that great measure of absolute justice which passed both branches of Congress, equalizing the bounties of soldiers, a measure in which over two hundred thousand veterans were interested, and which equalized the meager bounties they received in the early days of the war with the larger bounties paid near its close. Those who would have been benefited by this bill were the most meritorious followers of the flag. They rallied to it at the opening roar of the guns; they bore the heat and the burden of the day, and they only asked to be made equal in bounty with those who went in at the eleventh hour and in many instances never saw a line of battle.

But the veto which deprived the best veterans of the war of many millions of justly-earned money was delivered by a Republican President, and the leaders of the Republican party became instantly blind to the rank injustice inflicted on its victims, and quietly submitted without a word. If, however, in passing upon more than a thousand private acts of Congress granting pensions to individuals who had failed to make sufficient proof in the Pension Office, a Democratic President has here and there found one he could not approve, it has been sufficient to invoke storms, blizzards, and cyclones of wrath against him from such as prove their friendship for the soldier by clamorous and scandalous abuse of their political opponents. Sir, I turn once more to the record. Who has approved and signed more acts of Congress bestowing pensions on men, women, and children than all the other Presidents put together since the war, according to the time engaged in such work?

General Grant in eight years signed 485 pension bills; Hayes in four years signed 303 pension bills; Garfield and Arthur in four years signed 736 pension bills. On the other hand, in the short space of two years, 1886 and 1887, Cleveland signed 863 pension bills, being 378 more than Grant in eight years, 560 more than Hayes in four years, and 127 more than Garfield and Arthur in four years. Should Cleveland remain in office eight years, and continue to sign pension bills at the same rate which marked his first two years, his record would reach 3,452, being largely in excess of all the individual pension bills approved since the foundation of the Government to the present hour. And such is the man and such his record who is to be painted in the darkest colors as a malignant enemy of the Union soldier! With tireless and unquenchable animosity he is to be pursued on this utterly and abominably false issue by the desperate leaders of a broken party seeking to repair their shattered fortunes and to regain their lost estate. No considerations of fairness or consistency will for a moment restrain them. The veto of what was known as the dependent pension bill in the Forty-ninth Congress will be rung as a bitter accusation against the President and against the Democratic party, although that measure had the distinct and explicit condemnation of the Grand Army of the Republic itself.

THE ISSUE AGAINST DEMOCRATIC SOLDIERS.

But while dealing with the question of pensions, and the wholesale slander of the Democratic party in that connection, another and still baser Republican issue has been thrust into our faces here, and upon the country for political purposes. The fame of dead soldiers is no longer safe if they were Democrats when they marshaled and led their comrades to the banquet of battle and of death. Thersites, in the camp of the Greeks before the walls of Troy—

> Cursed with a flow of words, ever speaking,
> But ne'er to the purpose,

railed with foul invective against the heroes of Achaia, against Achilles, Odysseus, and great Agamemnon, king of men. But the objects of his venomous spleen and rage were alive and present to rebuke and chastise their insolent defamer.

The scene in the Senate of the United States a few weeks ago was different. When the presiding officer of this body, holding the highest official position now held by a Republican anywhere in the Government, and elevated to it by the united vote of his party, descended to the floor and maligned the memory of American heroes, they were not here to answer; they were sleeping where flowers and tears are annually commingled on Memorial day; they were resting after their glorious lives in the quiet bivouac of the dead. The pious task of making response for their lofty courage and supreme loyalty was appropriately performed by one whose own conspicuous gallantry and daring in arms against them gave him the generous right of chivalry to speak in their praise. It is true that not even the eloquent tongue of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] can reach McClellan or Hancock with assurances of their country's devotion and love.

> Can honor's voice provoke the silent dust,
> Or flattery soothe the dull, cold ear of death?

No; but the voice of the Senator from Kentucky on that occasion was an honor to American manhood and to American soldiery wherever they are to be found beneath the flag.

There are suggestions, however, inspired by the wanton and astounding assault of the Senator from Kansas which will not speedily pass from the public mind. He stood in his place in the Senate, a recognized leader of his party, and denounced two great Union generals as traitors to their country, allies of the Confederacy, and no word of dissent or rebuke has been uttered by a single one of his party associates here or in the other branch of Congress. We have waited, and some have wondered, but the silent acquiescence in the horrible charge remains unbroken. Its responsibility has therefore widened and deepened until we are forced to inquire its real intent and meaning. Are we to understand that the spirit of partisan falsehood is to dictate the history of the war for the Union, and to blacken for posterity not only the Democratic party, but to transmit to the future the names of individual members of that party, loaded with the odium of treason notwithstanding their great services in defense of their country?

There is much already written, called history of the war, to indicate a purpose of this kind. There was much occurred during the war, and in its management, evincing a disposition of not only unfairness, but of great hostility on the part of those in power towards officers in command who retained their fealty to the Democratic organization; but the speech of the Senator from Kansas is the first open and avowed attempt, and without disavowal from any of the associate leaders of his party, to impress the political literature of the country with the fact that no Democratic soldier was a loyal man, and that however distinguished he became in the military or naval service he was still an ally of the public enemy. Sir, what scenes of the past start afresh to our view upon the statement of an issue like this!

The uproar, the painful anxieties, the vigilant, sleepless sorrows of war seem again to be upon us. We hear the guns that broke the sacred stillness of peace at Sumter, and we behold the hurrying to and fro of the mighty forces of the North intent on the boundaries and the flag of the Union as made by our fathers. We behold the precipitate battle of the first Manassas, with unready, unseasoned, undisciplined troops, absent from their corn-fields and work-shops less, on the average, than sixty days. Some of us, yet here, walked the weird and solemn streets of this city during that Sunday night of July 21, 1861, with its midsummer moon and fleecy clouds, and heard the wearied gallop of the courier as he came over Long Bridge, and reached the War Department, with dispatches of disaster from the front.

We recall the dreadful morning that followed, when the very elements of nature seemed to mourn for the cause of the Union; when the clouds in inky darkness came down almost to the tree-tops, and when the rain fell in torrents, as if the heavens themselves wept over the brave remnants of a broken and routed army as they thronged back across the Potomac. McClellan! In this hour of national extremity he was called by despairing official authority from his brief but brilliant campaign in Western Virginia to perform a task greater far than was ever performed by Alexander, Hannibal, Cæsar, or Napoleon in the same length of time. He was ordered to the command of a disjointed, disorganized, demoralized body of defeated men, and was expected from them and the new levies which poured in to create, construct, discipline, and equip an army, and with it to seize upon the capital of the Confederacy and make complete conquest of the entire South in time to meet and control the political exigencies of the times.

He was an educated soldier, a vigilant and conscientious student of the art of war at home and in the different countries of Europe, and he knew that the resistance of the people of the South, eight millions strong, would require for its suppression such a military organization as had never occurred to the political charlatans then prophesying a ninety days' war. From his skill, great ability, and patient toil there arose out of chaos an army which through every storm and vicissitude of the war remained intact and the same—an army more distinctly historic in military annals than any other ever known among men—the Army of the Potomac.

We see McClellan confront the unbroken, unwasted military resources of the entire Confederacy at Richmond with the Army of the Potomac deprived of forty thousand men who belonged to it, and whose proper place was in line of battle with their comrades. It has been claimed that Stanton, the Secretary of War, like Carnot, organized victory. Sir, he organized defeat far more frequently. After the seven dreadful days in front of the Confederate capital, we hear McClellan, from Harrison's Landing on the James, saying in plain, indignant words, that if the Army were saved there were no thanks due to the Secretary of War; on the contrary, that he had done all he could to destroy it by withholding the heavy forces under McDowell and others on the line of the Rappahannock and elsewhere. Events moved with rapidity.

In brief space the great organizer and commander was deposed by the head of the War Office, who had never set a squadron in the field, and knew no more of war than he had learned in practicing law in the civil courts of the country. Again, his interference was followed by swift and terrible disaster. A second time the Union Army was broken and driven from the historic field of Manassas, and the vaunting, bombastic proclamations and orders of the new commander suddenly died away, and were changed into false accusations against others in order to conceal his own incompetence and to hide the shame of the War Department for having placed him in command. A necessity which involved the immediate possession of this seat of government and the very existence of the Government itself was alone strong enough to compel the restoration of McClellan, and when he rode out to meet his retreating troops scenes more thrilling and pathetic than any which greeted Napoleon on his return from Elba saluted him on all sides.

Strong men with bronzed faces screamed, and wept, and embraced each other with joy when they saw the man once more in command whom they loved and trusted to the death. His presence came like the wave of a mighty re-enforcement, and brought faith, hope, and courage back to the shattered and disheartened ranks. Even that great captain in the art of war, General Lee, could not conceive that the Army of the Potomac, after its disasters under Pope, could be brought without preparation and fatal delay into condition and confidence to again meet his own victorious forces. He invaded the North at once, with his eye on Washington, Baltimore, and Philadelphia, and they all would have fallen, carrying all the consequences therein implied, if he had beaten the Army of the Potomac on Northern soil as he had just beaten it in Virginia under Pope.

What a crisis, not only in American history, but in the history of human events! But McClellan, though known by his troops and by the whole world to be under the ban, and discredited by the partisan authorities of the Government he was offering his life to defend, led his faithful, devoted, and unquestioning columns, with not a day of rest, repose, or recuperation, to the pitched battle of the Union—the battle of Antietam, on the 17th of September, 1862, but two weeks and a few days after their crushing overthrow while under the command of a vapid, ignorant, spurious, vain-glorious military pretender. Fresh, as they were, from demoralization and defeat, yet under the eye of McClellan they were as steady, confident, aggressive, and brilliant in the face of death as was ever the Old Guard under the eye of the great Napoleon. This is history, not fiction.

McClellan gathered around him what remained of the great army he had created, led it against Lee's victorious legions, drove them back to the south side of the Potomac, achieved a victory unparalleled in war, considering all the conditions, and restored safety and future hope to the Government. No warrior ever deserved better of his country in this or in any other age than the brave, determined soldier, the zealous, conscientious patriot, and the accomplished, well-bred gentleman, who made Antietam as immortal as Marathon, and then within fifty days, while sweeping forward in the current of victory, the immediate peril gone and a sense of security restored, he was stricken by partisan malice and closed his lofty military career forever.

An eagle towering in his pride of place
Was by a mousing owl hawked at and killed.

And to this day clamorous kites and crows and other ignoble scavenger birds seek to tear and mutilate his spotless and august fame. Yes, George B. McClellan was a Democrat; and when removed from command on the 7th of November, 1862, he could, with uplifted hand, have sworn that he had saved the Republic, as did Cicero in the forum at Rome when official authority denied him justice. He created the Army of the Potomac, commanded it fourteen months, and retired at the zenith of success without speck, stain, or blemish on his honored and beloved name. Amongst the highest, the most fortunate, and most distinguished characters produced by the war where will you point to a name cleaner, purer, freer from self-seeking, and more devoted to a sublime sense of duty than that of McClellan? "After life's fitful fever he sleeps well," not disturbed by the partisan declamation of judge-advocates, provost marshals, nor peevish politicians.

Sir, we will shift the scenes of the past, in the midst of which we are moving, and move forward to another crisis of fate to the Republic only ten months later than the rescue at Antietam. In the mean time the Secretary of War had organized the bloody disasters at Fredericksburgh and Chancellorsville, and General Lee, having beaten the Army of the Potomac under Burnside and under Hooker, felt encouraged to again push his columns across the river, and to make his second invasion of the North. Gettysburgh! The civilized world knows the whole story, word for word, by heart. With the Union literally at stake to fight for, Hancock selected the battle ground, pitched the line of battle, mingled with his men under the hottest fire, cheered them by his glorious presence, and there, on the soil of his native State, which he watered with his blood, he achieved the most valuable victory, in its results, of the entire war, and wrote his own name, with his sword, amongst "the few, the immortal names not born to die."

When the sun rose on the 4th of July, 1863, and shone on Lee's army in retreat from Gettysburgh the last hope of the Southern Confederacy disappeared forever. What came afterwards; the Wilderness, Spottsylvania, Cold Harbor, Petersburgh, were the heroic and desperate struggles of a giant, but of a giant already dying of a mortal wound.

Sir, what invisible spirit of the air, intent upon evil to the Senator from Kansas, could have been in attendance on him when he stood up and opened his mouth here on the 6th of March? Antietam and Gettysburgh; McClellan and Hancock! They were the heroes of the two most consequential battles of the war; the loss of either one of which would have brought European recognition to the Confederacy, and darkness and dismay, if not final dissolution, to the Union. They commanded in the only battles fought north of the Potomac, and each time met the enemy as an invading force, strong, confident, and flushed with recent victories.

Antietam and Gettysburgh involved the possession of this Capital and the perpetuity of the Government as our fathers made it, and to McClellan and Hancock, now stigmatized as allies of the Confederacy, was committed the measureless and awful trust of defending and preserving them both. If we are asked hereafter where were the greatest leaders of the Democratic party during the war, where the Democratic candidate of 1864 for the Presidency, and where the Democratic candidate of 1880, we will point to the undulating slopes of Antietam and to the crested heights of Gettysburgh. These men, I knew them both, and I bow to their mighty shades wherever they are this day. They were of loftier mold than Greek or Roman history supplies. The "warrior ranks of Achaia" furnish not their peers; not the golden-locked Achilles, nor "the high-born son of Laertes," nor the "wide-ruling king, Agamemnon."

Cæsar broke his military oaths, crossed the forbidden Rubicon, wrecked his country's liberties, and lost his life in pursuing his own ambition. McClellan and Hancock belonged rather to the type of manhood which illuminated and glorified the era of the American Revolution. Their strong and broad capacity, their unselfish and unquestioning subordination, their absolute love of country, and their unfaltering courage would have given them then, as they have now, a high place amongst the foremost military chieftains in the history of nations. And yet such are the soldiers who are mocked, scoffed, and denounced as belonging to the subservient elements of the North, and accused of treason by those who are of the breed of Job's war-horse, and who, like him, snuffed the battle from afar off.

Sir, I take leave of this theme for the present and turn to another which has been decreed in Republican councils as one of the foremost issues in the political canvass just now opening.

THE ISSUE OF SECTIONAL HATE.

Who, Mr. President, has not followed with loving heart the wanderings and the work of Old Mortality pursuing his pious task, with mallet and chisel, restoring the time-worn, weather-beaten, and fading names and epitaphs of the honored but almost forgotten dead? The genius of the great master and magician, rich and fertile as he was in wonderful and beautiful creations, evoked from the legendary lore of Scotland no picture more fascinating than the bent form of this old man, whose self-imposed mission it was to bring two distant periods of time together in tender and reverent memories, to fill the minds of his own generation with grateful affection for the past, and to produce, as far as in his humble power, peace and harmony on earth and good-will among men.

How dark and striking in contrast is the spectacle we behold at this time in our country and in our own midst! Nothing can be presented more repulsive to the minds of benevolent beings, whether in this world or in the world of justified spirits, than the leaders of a great party crouching down amongst the baser passions of mankind, and there fanning, kindling, and carrying fuel to the expiring and almost extinguished embers yet here and there to be found among the ashes of a dreadful fraternal war. Twenty-three springs and summers have decorated with flowers the graves of the dead, and as many autumns and winters have covered them with falling funeral leaves and shrouds of snow, since peace was declared between soldiers in the field, and yet at this late day a campaign of political animosity is again declared against the people of the South, their rights, their security, and their good name.

The especial anger of Republican leaders is excited because the vote of the South in a national contest is solid against their party. Will some one on the other side of the Chamber, and with even the slightest knowledge of human nature, tell me how the vote of the South could be other than it is? You had political supremacy once from the Potomac to the Rio Grande. At one time and another for seven years and more after the war you had the ascendency in every State of the entire South; you elected Republican governors, State officers, and legislatures in them all. You had the purse with which to corrupt, the sword with which to intimidate, and a Republican Congress and President to enact and to enforce all laws necessary for the overthrow of individual and State rights and for the consolidation of your power.

You seized upon the enfranchised negro and sought to organize and hurl him against the peace and security of political and social order, and for a time and in many instances you succeeded. You and your allies, who mostly went there from the North, not "allies of the Confederacy," but allies for power and plunder, swept down upon the helpless South like Hyder-Ali upon the Carnatic, and left scarcely a vestige from which to hope and with which to rebuild, except its never-failing soil and its staunch and splendid manhood. You despoiled States of their resources, and you dismantled them of their credit. You issued their bonds and securities in the interest of fraud, and hawked them on the markets, like counterfeit paper, for anything you could get.

You ordered investigations, and sent committees and commissions, composed of your bitterest partisans, into the South, for the purpose of scraping together and putting in permanent form the perjuries of vagabonds and scoundrels with which to defame and blacken the reputation of the Southern people. They were proclaimed in some instances as bandits, and in others as barbarians. You repeatedly annulled honest elections when their results were favorable to the stability and good order of society and against the schemes of partisan plunderers. You would have overturned the State government of South Carolina in 1876, and again sacked the substance and the credit of the State, had it not been that a giant stood in your way upheld by the public judgment of the world.

You provoked collisions between the two races in order to justify military usurpation and to inflame sectional hate at the North. Sir, the career of the Republican party during its ascendency in the South was a career of crime, unrelieved by a single act tending to promote the education, the progress, the prosperity, the peace, or the happiness of either race, white or black. It reared and left behind it no monument of patriotism, wisdom, or benevolence to tell future ages that its presence had been a blessing and not a curse. And when the future historian comes to inquire why and how and exactly when the Republican party lost its tremendous hold on the prostrate South and slunk away to return no more forever, he will be puzzled to make answer in definite details, but he will finally write that its administration throughout all that region had become so vast and intolerable a scandal, filling the civilized world with its foul odors, that an intelligent and omnipotent public opinion here and everywhere demanded its downfall and the restoration on its ruins of home rule and decent government.

And it is this party, sir, whose leaders now fume and resolve and threaten the Southern people and their States, because they do not welcome it back again into power with all its unhallowed memories and its predaceous instincts and habits! As well might you expect a frontier settlement to welcome with joy a second invasion of tomahawks and scalping-knives.

Why gape and wonder at the result of the election a few days ago in Louisiana? There is nothing in the 75,000 Democratic majority to marvel at. It was simply the overwhelming protest of the people of that State, terrified and appalled at the prospect of ever again being governed by the leaders of the Republican party, and the only wonder is that the vote was not unanimous.

They had in former times seen their State government pass into Republican hands with a debt of but $1,500,000, and they had seen her in the short space of four years afterwards crushed to the very earth, financially ruined, bankrupted, and dishonored by a mountainous debt of $50,000,000. The people of Louisiana of both races had witnessed worse and more dishonest government in their State under Republican rule than the pirate chiefs of Barrataria ever inflicted in their lawless camps, and in the recent election they simply declared with great emphasis that they wanted such government no more forever.

But, sir, suppose we permit the people of the entire South to make answer by their works to the reproaches of sectional hate, to the proposed inquest legislation of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], and to the other revolutionary and unconstitutional measures introduced at the present session here, and in the other branch of Congress. The spirit of wonderful progress does not seize upon a country afflicted with lawlessness and social and political disorder. Capital does not seek investment in a land of crime and insecurity. Business men do not carry their money to the homes of criminals and outlaws to make new purchases and to increase their gains. Let the condition of the South to-day interpret the full meaning of these propositions. Her development, since left to the control of her own local affairs, and during the last ten years, in all the great industrial pursuits, is to the minds of thoughtful observers a marvel in the history of mankind. Since 1879, careful and reliable statistics show that over 15,000 miles of railroad have been built on Southern soil, and that over $600,000,000 have been put into the construction of new and the improvement of old roads in that section of the country. Within the same length of time the cotton crop has averaged $300,000,000 a year, the total value of agricultural products upward of $700,000,000 a year, and the assessed value of the entire property of the South has increased more than $1,000,000,000 since 1879.

In order to show still further that the sound, conservative local governments of the South have encouraged their own citizens, as well as citizens of the North and of Europe, to embark in a wide diversity of new enterprises, and as showing the continued and increasing confidence inspired by the law-abiding people in the Southern States, I call attention to their industrial growth in 1887 as compared with the former year, 1886. I quote from high authority:

From Maryland to Texas the progress was remarkable, covering almost the entire range of industry, and there is scarcely a single line of manufacturing or mining business in which the number of new enterprises reported during 1887 is not more than twice as large as in 1886. Of the fourteen Southern States there are only four in which the capital invested in new enterprises was not double the amount invested last year. The number of new enterprises organized or established during 1887 was 3,430, as compared with 1,570 in 1886. The amount of capital, including capital stock of incorporated companies organized during 1887, was $256,238,000, as compared with $126,226,000 in 1886.

* * * In cotton manufacturing there has been great activity, and seventy-seven new mills have been projected, many of them being now under construction, which is the largest number of new mills ever reported in one year. Cotton mills are reported as having largely oversold their production, and many old mills are being enlarged to meet the demand for their goods. Increasing diversification of Southern industries is illustrated in the fact that Alabama alone secured during the year the location of five large car-building plants, two at Decatur and one each at Birmingham, Anniston, and Gadsden. The Anniston works will cost $1,000,000, employ one thousand mechanics, and will turn out twenty complete cars a day, from freight to passenger, parlor, and sleeping-cars—the entire work, from making the wheels to the upholstering, to be done in these shops. One of the car plants at Decatur is being built by the Louisville and Nashville Railroad and the other will be the large works, now at Urbana, Ohio, which are to be removed to Decatur. In the building of rolling-mills, pipe-works, machine-shops, and foundries the same activity is seen, while furniture factories, agricultural-implement works, flour mills, gas and electric works, canning factories, wood-working establishments, etc., are being started all over the South.

And when we add to this brilliant picture of material development the successful labors of the people of the South in the cause of those twin blessings, education and the Christian religion, we need no longer wonder that they are hopeful, and indeed confident, of their great future, and that at last they feel that the shafts of their political enemies will glance and fall harmless from their shield of honor, industry, and good faith, a shield more invincible and brighter far than that wrought and fashioned for the Grecian warrior by Hephæstus, and on which

He emblazoned earth, and the sky, and the belt of the blue sea.

I speak not of a New South, as if a new race had arisen, not of new faculties and gifts heretofore unknown, but of a people who for more than two centuries and a half have proved themselves equal to the requirements of the loftiest manhood, who were foemen once worthy of the Northmen's steel, and who are brethren now worthy of American embrace, affection, and pride everywhere.

When called upon before the people of my State in the approaching contest, as I have been for thirty years and more, to answer for the conduct of my political friends of the South, may I not respond with the immortal philosophy of the mighty Nazarene?

Ye shall know them by their fruits. Do men gather grapes of thorns or figs of thistles?

I rejoice that the corrupt tree once planted in the South has been torn up by the roots, and that the good tree, bearing good fruit, is towering under a Southern sky in perennial bloom and beauty. The declivities of the Southern mountains are pouring forth their wealth of iron and of coal, and the water-courses and boundless soil productions of that country combine to insure a future there more ample in its contributions to human happiness and more resplendent in its accumulated wealth than the most prosperous ages heretofore have known.

The South is simply rising to her manifest destiny, and with her gateways of immigration thrown wide open by the abolition of slavery, with a soil of unapproachable fecundity, with timber, water-powers, and mineral resources, practically boundless in extent, and with a climate adapted to the processes of a propagating garden, it bewilders the most imperial imagination to attempt to grasp her condition a hundred years hence, or even fifty, or even a quarter of a century. It would seem, in view of her grand resurrection and her speedy and lofty flight, that, with slight change of phraseology, and no change of meaning, the sublime conception and words of Milton might, with propriety, be applied at this time to the South:

Methinks I see in my mind a noble and puissant nation rousing herself like a strong man after sleep, and shaking his invincible locks. Methinks I see her as an eagle mewing her mighty youth, and kindling her undazzled eyes at the full midday beam, purging and unsealing her long-abused sight at the fountain itself of Heavenly radiance; while the whole noise of timorous and flocking birds, with those also that love the twilight, flutter about, amazed at what she means, and in their envious gabble would prognosticate a year of sects and schisms.

Lo! the dawn of the coming and perfect day of union, nationality, and fraternity is breaking from the morning sky and streaming into our darkened windows. Joy cometh with the morning and all the flocking birds with their envious gabble can not retard its beams or turn back its beneficent course. The South is in and of the Union as much as when Washington, the great Virginian, the great American, led the forces of liberty and union from Bunker Hill to Yorktown. Virginia and New York may clasp fraternal hands as of yore; Massachusetts and South Carolina may again embrace; Georgia is the peer of Pennsylvania, and Texas in her giant stateliness is required by our matchless Constitution to bow on equal terms with the petite sovereignties of Rhode Island and Vermont. The Union is restored, the wounds of war have healed, and accursed as malefactors of their kind be those who would tear them open and make them bleed afresh!

Sir, I have spoken to-day for the truth of history, for the peace, harmony, and prosperity of our common country, in defense of the honor and good name of illustrious soldiers and citizens falsely defamed, and in vindication of that great political organization which has come down to us from the opening of the present century based upon the eternal principles of "equal and exact justice to all men and exclusive privileges to none." The Democratic party began its career and has maintained it in the broad spirit of nationality and fraternal union. No thought of a disunion of the States ever entered its councils as a party, and it filled the ranks of armies in the North and commanded them with its bravest and best; but when the war of the sections was over it longed to see the sword changed to the plowshare, the spear to the pruning-hook, and that confidence and affection should speedily prevail again in all our borders.

The Democratic party originated in a devotion to personal liberty, and to the guaranties, securities, and limitations of the Constitution. It was called into existence by the daring encroachments of Federal authority, and has stood sentinel ever since, in times of war, as well as in times of peace, over those fundamental muniments of civil and religious liberty, free speech, free press, the right to the writ of habeas corpus, and the right of trial by jury impartially selected.

A determined attempt was made during the war of the rebellion, and it has been continued since, to blacken the names of the great civil as well as military leaders who remained true to the Democratic party, as at enmity with the cause of the Union and in an alliance of sentiment at least with the Confederacy.

On the contrary, I assert that the impartial historian of the future will record as a fact that but for the attitude and influence of Horatio Seymour, Thomas A. Hendricks, Allen G. Thurman, William A. Richardson, and their political associates and followers, not only would the Union never have been restored, but that the dearest and most sacred rights of American citizenship would have been swept away in the blinding storm of partisan wrath, which was most frequently mistaken for patriotic zeal. Those who, through good and through evil report, kept the immortal safeguards of the Constitution displayed like beacon lights on a dangerous coast will be remembered with gratitude as long as the best principles of free government survive.

Sir, I have no fears for the future of the political organization in whose ranks I stand. For more than three-quarters of a century it has withstood and triumphed over all assaults, and it will do so now and hereafter. Mistakes may occur, and men will err, for to be human is to be fallible, but the sound and healthful principles of a Democracy faithful to liberty, equality, and to the fruits of labor, will always prove a speedy and a sovereign remedy.

The Democratic party contains the gathered wisdom and experience of generations, and towers in its strength and majesty far higher than the heads of any of its individual members. It has listened to and absorbed the teachings of Jefferson and Madison, of Jackson, Polk, Benton, Cass, Marcy, and Silas Wright; and though its giant leaders have fallen and passed away, yet it has not stopped nor faltered in its powerful and glorious career. The administration of this Government is now once more, after the lapse of years, in the hands of the Democratic party, and its response to the great trust has been worthy of its historic fame. Some disappointments have been felt, some complaints have been heard, as was inevitable; but the verdict of the American people in November of this year will be that there has been honest, capable government, and that it shall be continued.

FORFEITURE OF UNEARNED RAILROAD LANDS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The Calendar under Rule VIII is in order, and the Secretary will report the next case in order on the Calendar.

Mr. DOLPH. I think under the agreement the Senate made yesterday the land-forfeiture bill comes up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair was not aware of any such agreement, but if there be such an agreement, as the Secretary informs him there is, the Secretary will report the bill referred to by title.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 1430) to forfeit certain lands heretofore granted for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask unanimous consent that the pending order be temporarily laid aside in order to ask the Senate to pass a resolution which is on the Calendar, providing for the printing of matter in a hearing before a committee. It was objected to the other day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire asks the unanimous consent of the Senate that the pending order be informally laid aside in order that the Senate may consider the resolution referred to by him. Is there objection?

Mr. BLAIR. It will take no time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears none. The resolution will be read.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE HEARINGS.

Mr. BLAIR. I call the attention of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] to the resolution which I have called up. He objected to it the other day. I wish him to withdraw his objection and let it pass.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Select Committee on Woman Suffrage be authorized to employ a stenographer for the purpose of reporting arguments before it, who shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate, and to have the arguments before it printed.

Mr. BLAIR. The argument was given and it took only part of a day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Will the Senate agree to the resolution?

Mr. BERRY. When I objected to the consideration of the resolution I was under the impression that it provided for the printing of testimony hereafter to be taken. I learn that the testimony has already been taken and it is simply to pay the reporter for the work. Therefore I have no objection to the resolution.

Mr. HOAR. Should not the resolution have been referred to the Committee on Contingent Expenses?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution was reported from that committee.

The resolution was agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION AND LABOR.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask the Senate to consider Order of Business 1063, a resolution to print the notes of a hearing before the Committee on Education and Labor, which has also been reported by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Education and Labor be authorized to employ a stenographer for the purpose of reporting the hearings before it upon Sunday-observance petitions and the proposed prohibition constitutional amendment, who shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate, and to have the reports of said hearings printed for the use of the Senate.

AMENDMENT TO A BILL.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 270) to establish a United States court in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes; which was ordered to be printed.

BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 2083) to provide for the establishment of a Bureau of Animal Industry, and to facilitate the exportation of live-stock and their products, to extirpate contagious pleuro-pneumonia and other diseases among domestic animals, and for other purposes.

Mr. PLUMB. I wish to ask the Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER] if it would not be consistent with his duty towards the bill just announced to allow it to be laid aside, so that the Senate may proceed with the consideration of the forfeiture bill?

Mr. CHACE. Does that require unanimous consent, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It does.

Mr. CHACE. I object.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2083) to provide for the establishment of a Bureau of Animal Industry, and to facilitate the exportation of live-stock and their products, to extirpate contagious pleuro-pneumonia and other diseases among domestic animals, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment offered by Mr. PALMER as a substitute for the bill.

Mr. PALMER. That bill has not been discussed as it ought to be, and I do not think that a vote on it at the present time is desirable. If it can be laid aside informally without losing its place, I should be willing to consent to that arrangement for the purpose of having the railroad forfeiture bill considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan asks the unanimous consent of the Senate that the unfinished business be informally laid aside, in order that the Senate may proceed to the consideration of the railroad forfeiture bill. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

FORFEITURE OF UNEARNED RAILROAD LANDS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1430) to forfeit certain lands heretofore granted for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to move an amendment, which I have somewhere in my possession.

CONFERENCE WITH SOUTH AMERICAN COUNTRIES.

Mr. FRYE. While the Senator is looking for his amendment, I should like to take from the table a conference report on the proposed conference of American nations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report suggested by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The report of the committee of conference on the bill (H. R. 1473) authorizing the President of the United States to arrange a conference between the United States of America and the Republics of Mexico, Central and South America, Hayti, San Domingo, and the Empire of Brazil.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the report of the committee of conference, which has been heretofore read.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, several Senators have suggested constitutional objections to one of the amendments reported; and while I am not prepared to admit the soundness of their criticisms, the profound respect I entertain for their learning does, I agree, leave my mind in some doubt. Now, sir, this is a very important bill, well calculated to promote immensely the interests of the countries taking part in the conference; and I do not wish it to go to the President with any unbaptized spot on it. I suggest to the Senate that we disagree to the report, insist, and ask for further conference. The conferees associated with me in this report concur in the opinion I express.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Will the Senate agree to the report of the committee of conference?

The report was rejected.

Mr. FRYE. Now I move that the Senate further insist on its amendment and ask for another conference with the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1158) for the relief of Lewis Jacobson.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. 173) granting a pension to Henry B. Very;

A bill (S. 293) granting a pension to Mrs. Arabella Coddington;

A bill (S. 679) granting a pension to Henry Stafford;

A bill (S. 1431) for establishing a light or lights and other aids to navigation to guide into Charlotte Harbor, Florida;

A bill (S. 2085) to provide for protecting the navigation of the Illinois River by extending the system of beacon lights to said river;

A bill (S. 2179) authorizing the Kansas City, Texarkana and Gulf Railway Company to bridge the Red and Little Rivers in the State of Arkansas;

A bill (H. R. 1406) to provide for the sale of certain New York Indian lands in Kansas;

A bill (H. R. 4365) to authorize the construction of an arsenal for the manufacture of ordnance and ordnance stores for the use of the Government of the United States at Columbia, Tenn.;

A bill (H. R. 4964) to prevent any person or persons in the cities of Washington and Georgetown from making books and pools on the result of trotting or running races, or boat races; and

A bill (H. R. 6894) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889.

FORFEITURE OF UNEARNED RAILROAD LANDS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1430) to forfeit certain lands heretofore granted for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes.

Mr. HOAR. I move the amendment which I send to the desk to be inserted as a new section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add as a new section the following:

That in all cases where any of the lands forfeited by the first section of this act have heretofore been sold by the proper officers of the United States for cash, or with the allowance and approval of the proper officers of the United States entered in good faith under the homestead or pre-emption laws, or have been selected by any State and certified by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and approved by the Secretary of the Interior in satisfaction or as part of any grant to such State in aid of any public work or improvement which has been fully completed, the right and title of all persons holding or claiming any such lands under such sales, entries, or selections, and certificates shall be, and are hereby, confirmed, where, at the date of the passage of this act, there are no adverse claims to the same on file or of record arising under the general land laws of the United States; and any controversies or conflicting claims between adverse claimants, or between such adverse claimants and those whose title would otherwise be confirmed by the provisions of this act shall be determined according to the priority of entry, certification, or application, and the provisions of existing laws, and in the same manner in all respects as though the said grants herein forfeited had never been made by the United States.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, the amendment which has just been read is one prepared by the late Secretary of the Interior, now the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], with the exception that the place in one sentence of a certain clause has been changed, making it a little clearer, but not, as I understand, at all affecting the meaning of the amendment.

Mr. PALMER. I would ask the Senator from Massachusetts if that was in regard to the State selections, a change of phraseology?

Mr. HOAR. Yes; but the effect is the same.

Now, Mr. President, the question presented by this amendment is a very important one, and yet a very simple one. It is intended by this amendment, as I understand it, to save the title of certain persons, and, among them (which has brought my attention specially to the bill), certain citizens of my own State, or certain residents of Michigan claiming under those citizens, who claim to have acquired titles to land in good faith, titles to which there is no equitable objection whatever, and resting on facts on which the unbroken policy of the Government has induced Congress to make confirmation in all similar cases. There is nobody who has, as I understand it, a pretense of title in law, in justice, or in equity who will be injured by it.

The story is a very simple one. Congress in the year 1856 granted to the State of Michigan certain lands for the purpose of building a railroad from Ontonagon to the Wisconsin State line, and the lands were to be selected within a certain distance of the line of that road. The railroad was not built, and there was a grant for another railroad at a later year and only 15 or 20 miles of that road were built, and the lands belonging to those 15 or 20 miles were duly selected, and are out of the way for the purposes of this debate. Then in the year 1865 Congress granted to the State of Michigan 200,000 acres of land for the purpose of aiding in the construction of the Portage Lake and Lake Superior Ship-Canal, a canal of the highest public importance, especially to the commerce of the State of Michigan and the other Lake States, which saved to that commerce many miles of stormy and dangerous lake navigation.

It was required that those lands should be selected within a certain distance of the proposed canal. Then at a later period a new grant was made for the same canal, it not having been constructed, in which Congress omitted the provision that the lands should be selected close to the canal, and the governor of the State of Michigan, who was empowered by the law to make the selections with the approbation of the Secretary of the Interior, who was empowered by the law to approve the selection, selected 15,000 acres in the lands which had been previously granted for this railroad, the railroad never having been built, except the little portion I have described, and there being no pretense whatever that the remainder of the railroad land grant had been earned.

Before the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Schulenberg vs. Harriman, in 17 Wallace, it was supposed that when a grant of land was made to a railroad on condition of the road's being constructed it was a grant on condition-precedent, so that the company took no title until the construction was made, and that the land remained the public land of the United States, subject to other grants, to other entries or selections under existing law, until that was completed. But it turned out to be law under the decision of the Supreme Court that these land grants are conditions-subsequent, so that the title vests in the road to which they are granted, and even if the company has performed nothing stipulated on its part to earn the lands, still the title remains in the grantee of the United States until some act of Congress or other significant act of forfeiture under the authority of the Government of the United States.

Therefore it turns out that the governor of Michigan and the Secretary of the Interior erred when they undertook to select from these railroad lands the 15,000 acres for the canal grant. Some portions of these lands, though generally of very poor quality, were lands containing iron mines, as it turned out afterwards, and I understand—the gentlemen who are familiar with the land laws of the United States will correct me if I am wrong—that it is perfectly and absolutely settled by the decisions of the Attorney-General and of the Supreme Court of the United States that iron mines do not come within the description of mineral lands in the exception which prevents railroads to whom such grants are made from selecting that class of lands.

These were the only two flaws or doubts on the title of the grantees under this new selection. In the first place there was expended a considerable sum for the construction of the canal, about $3,000,000; but it remaining incomplete and the company being bankrupt, certain people raised a further sum of $1,000,000 in cash, purchased the charter, completed the canal, and proceeded to take possession of the land grant under a judgment of foreclosure.

So, then, the United States and the commerce of the country have got beyond a question and beyond a dispute, everything in the way of consideration which the Government originally contemplated; and the simple question is, it having turned out that there was a technical title in this old railroad, which was never built until the Government had entered and foreclosed, whether now, as we have a bill foreclosing all these railroad grants, we propose not to confirm the title under this canal selection merely because 15,000 acres were selected in the vicinity of this railroad and not in the vicinity of the canal? That is the naked question.

Now, Mr. President, as I understand it, purchasers in good faith have gone in and settled upon these lands. There are villages, churches, schools, stores on them. These are purchasers in good faith, men who entered upon and cultivated the land; and there are in some instances, I understand, mines which have been worked, of great value and at great cost. I have in my desk here a selection of the acts of Congress where a similar policy in similar cases has been pursued; and with all the prejudice which exists against railroad grants, with all the strictness which the public sentiment looks for at our hands in legislating upon them, I am not aware of an instance where Congress has refused to confirm a title which is only doubtful in consequence of a technicality like that I have described.

But, Mr. President, there is a formidable opposition here, and I understand that that opposition comes from a single source. A company of speculators dwelling in the city of Washington, learning these facts, proceeded to get up a scheme. They proposed to engage and employ persons to go onto these lands or to profess to go on and make pretended entries as homesteaders or as pre-emptioners. With the men they got to go on there they made written contracts, that the schemers should have a quarter of the lands if they were obtained. They supposed that if they could get up a pretense of an actual homestead or pre-emption title Congress would be pretty likely to forfeit the railroad grant, and then go on and declare that the homestead and pre-emption titles which existed there should be confirmed, and thereupon the honest settlers under this canal title, or the honest claimants under it, would be ousted of their rights.

These men were sent there to put on their claims, as I said the other day, in some instances on a graveyard, in another instance on a church. There are claims five or six deep on particular tracts of land where the evidence taken before the Department of the Interior shows that no human being ever really visited the land or went upon it.

I have in my possession here the letters written by a member of this company to one of his associates, in which he expressly declares in the first letter that he knows that the persons who are sent upon these lands will be obliged to commit perjury, the law requiring them to make oath that they have made no contract for conveying any interest in the thing conveyed to anybody else, and in a second letter expressing his fear that some of these men will not go through with the scheme. He says he thinks they would do it if they had not got a "moral twist" over them. These, as I said, were to have one-quarter of all the interest. I should like to have the Chief Clerk read, beginning at page 119, the copy of the contract made between this company of speculators and the persons whom they sent on, and then read the letters which follow. The letter writers, as I understand, are citizens of Washington.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chief Clerk will read as indicated.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

EXHIBIT No. 76.

Copy of contract referred to by affiant (original will be filed with the affidavit).

In consideration of the services performed and to be performed by Redington & Hill, land and mine attorneys, of Washington, D. C., as attorneys for John Rutter in the pre-emption claim for the N. ½ of SE. ¼, SW. ¼ of SE. ¼, and the SE. ¼ of SW. ¼, section 17, township 42 north, range 35 west, Michigan, now pending before the Secretary of the Interior, promise to pay to the said Redington & Hill, or order, the sum of one-fourth interest in the land, thirty days after date of decision by the honorable Secretary of the Interior.

Given under my hand, at Escanaba, in the State of Michigan, the 17th day of August, A. D. 1883.

JOHN RUTTER.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 4, 1882.

DEAR SIR: Yours of the 1st is received. You wrote to me to advise you and furnish scrip, and offering me an eighth interest. At that very time I was getting matters together for going for this very land; but on being called on by you, I considered myself estopped. You offered me an eighth, and wanted the scrip at $20 when it was selling at $25. I considered you would prefer giving me a quarter rather than pay $25, and sent the scrip and agreement as I did as a reply to your proposition, directing you not to take scrip if you did not agree. There was no ambiguity about it, and no lawyer was necessary to construe it. As to the scrip you propose to turn over in lieu, I have already bought it once, and I do not propose to buy it again if a lawsuit can get it. Mr. Black offered them to me at $12 per acre; his proposition was accepted, and then he, finding a few more dollars could be made, turned it over to you; but that is not the way I do business. The sale was made to me, and I propose to enforce it. Had you called on Johnson originally when you wrote to me you would have been advised that the land was disposed of, and would not have gone in. The exact status of the land he has not got through him yet, though he has been buzzing every attorney in town about it. The Commissioner of the General Land Office, as one of the board of adjudication, has reported these illegal Supreme Court locations for confirmation, and I stopped that, so they did not go before the board; but they would have for all the protection you would have had from him.

After you called on me for advice in the matter you should not have dropped me the way you did. I do not like to start a man into a good thing an' then have a mutton-head reap the advantage of it.

Yours, truly,

W. C. HILL.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 11, 1882.

DEAR SIR: Yours of the 8th is received. Mr. Black had contracted to sell those homesteads to me, and sold to you at an advance, and then told me he was unable to secure them.

Johnson is a clever fellow and honest, though I thought he should not have accepted your proposition when he knew I had started you in the matter. In fact, we have a rule here in our attorneys' association which forbids this very thing. He is a tolerable land lawyer for ordinary homestead and pre-emption matters, but not ready enough for a case like this, where we are opposed by large equities. I am very much disposed to stick when I fix a fee, but I have more at stake here than you, as I must keep up the status of the scrip, and so I can not afford to have a location fail, as I feared it would with J.

The applications are here, but to-day had not got to their proper division, and so I could not examine them; will Monday. Send agreements.

Yours, truly,

W. C. HILL.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 13, 1882.

DEAR SIR: Yours of the 9th is received. I advised Jacobs to locate E. ½ SE., 26; and as he said the parties, some of them, objected on account of friendship to locators of Supreme Court scrip, I myself mailed applications and scrip last Saturday. I will of course withdraw them. You did right in the matter, for, as the sequel shows, your not doing it would not protected these invalid entries. Somebody was bound to do it. Canal case in statu quo.

Yours, truly,

W. C. HILL.

A. MATHEWS, Esq.,
Marquette, Mich.

Have just withdrawn my applications by telegraph.

H.

We do not want action in your canal case until we get action by Secretary on Chandler's.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 31, 1882.

DEAR SIR: Yours of the 21st is received. Take all the settlers' claims on odd sections you can if you can get them on paper to agree to give us a one-quarter interest. If their filings are rejected, notify me in each case, and I will send form of appeal. I am satisfied they have no legal status under present law; but when the railroad grant is forfeited or extended, the settlers' claim will be recognized, and so we should get them on the record in some way.

Yours, truly,

W. C. HILL.

A. MATHEWS, Esq.,

Mr. HOAR. Let me interrupt the reading by calling the attention of the Senate to that passage. The writer of that letter says, after speaking of the large interest they have to contend with, that they must have a contract for a quarter interest in the entry. The statute of the United States, as it will appear in the next letter, the writer well knew required every one of these men to make oath that he had made no such contract with any person whatever.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading will proceed.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

[W. C. Hill, land and mine attorney, room 18, St. Cloud Building.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 10, 1882.

DEAR SIR: I return herewith the duplicate agreement, duly signed.

I inclose draught of appeal in all cases of rejected pre-emption or homestead claims on the odd sections. As a matter of fact, I do not believe the lands are now public lands. But the appeal is in accordance with the theory of the General Land Office, or a number of prominent clerks in it; will serve our purpose, right or wrong, as I am confident the actual settlers can be protected by properly representing them before Congress, and the legislation on the grant made to conform, whether grant is extended or declared forfeited.

Of course the settlers, if they make agreements with us, will perjure themselves in making final proof. If we had agreements we could command the situation. If we do not we are helpless, except when you know the parties and can get a moral twist on them. It is the choice of evils, and you, being on the ground, can best judge.

In each case send me copy of D. S., with rejection and appeal on it, so I can have a record of the whole proceeding.

Yours, truly,

W. C. HILL.

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 10, 1883.

DEAR SIR: Since our correspondence relative to pre-emption and other claims against the cash-entry men and railroad, I have formed a law partnership with Mr. Redington, of which you were advised by our card.

We are getting the cases referred to in shape for action this summer, and propose to stir up the whole business. Upon examination I find the following cases, applications of file D. S., all sent me by you, and I have before me several of your letters relative to the best way of securing fees.

Our idea is to take a written contract for a certain money fee, contingent upon result; it ought not to be less than $500 in each case. If these parties still desire our services in the prosecution of their claims please advise us at once, and have them execute a contract to us on the inclosed form for a money fee, contingent upon success in procuring an allowance of entry. The cases we have from you are as follows:

William J. Tully, S. ½ NE. ¼, NE. ¼ SE. ¼, and W. ½ SE. ¼, 19, 43, 34; Fred. A. Hall, W. ½ W. ½, 17, 43, 34; David Roach, SW. ¼, 29, 43, 34; Duncan McGillivray, NW. ¼, 19, 43, 34; A. J. Kalkins, W. ½ SE. ¼ and S. ½ SW. ¼, 31, 43, 34; John C. Hay, SW. ¼, section 33, 43, 34; Frank W. Singler, SW. ¼, section 33, 43, 34. The last two are for the same land, both sent to me by you. What was the mistake? If you have at any time sent me others, which in the hurry of business have been overlooked in our present arrangement of the cases, please advise me.

We are willing to serve these claimants and are quite confident of ultimate success, but we think we should be secured as to our fees. Please let us hear from you at your early convenience.

Yours, very truly,

W. C. HILL.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 26, 1884.

MY DEAR SIR: Your favor of the 20th instant has been duly received. I was very sorry not to see you again before you left Washington, but you know how busy I was just at that time, and how much I was obliged to be out of the office. I had hoped to consult at length with you in regard to the details of the Sault St. Marie case.

While, of course, this case involves other elements than were found in the Chandler case, and although it is undoubtedly more complicated and difficult, yet I still think the law is with us, and that the case ought to be won. You know, however, as well as I do, the uncertainty of departmental litigation. The Department is a court in little but the name.

If we go on with the case, the fight will be prolonged, and require a good deal of labor on my part. I should dislike very much to see a case of that kind, in which I have confidence, abandoned, and yet I do not feel like urging its continuance. I shall be glad to take hold of the case and fight it through if we can adjust the matter of compensation.

You know Mr. Hill has retired entirely from practice, and I have succeeded to the business of the firm, excepting the pre-emption and homestead cases in the Iron River district, which we still hold jointly. I shall have to look after your case without assistance from him; and as I already have more than I can attend to without working harder than a man really ought, I do not feel at liberty to take cases involving great labor without some reasonable compensation. This, I understand from your correspondence upon the matter, you are willing to arrange.

I think, under all the circumstances of the case, you should send me, say, $250 retainer, and give me a contingent interest in the claim. I should be glad to hear from you at an early day upon the matter; and I shall be in a position within a week or ten days to take hold of the case if desired.

I close the argument in the canal case to-morrow. Did you get a copy of the testimony? If not, I will send you one, although they are very scarce and hard to get.

Yours, very truly,

JAMES K. REDINGTON.

EXHIBIT No. 78.

[These contracts relate principally to the lands occupied by the village of Iron River and the valuable iron mines adjoining the village.]

This agreement witnesseth that, whereas Abram Mathews, of Marquette, Mich., has applied to enter, with three certain Porterfield warrants, the N. ½ of SW. ¼ and NW. ¼ of SE. ¼ section 26, township 43 north, range 35 west, at the local land office at Marquette, Mich., and also at the same places with soldiers' additional homestead claims the SW. ¼ of SW. ¼ sections 26, 43, 35; SW. ¼ of SW. ¼ section 6, township 42 north, range 34 west; N. ½ of NW ¼ and E. ½ of NE. ¼ section 12; the N. ½ of NE. ¼ and NE. ¼ of NW. ¼ section 2, township 42 north, range 35 west, and the S. ½ of SW. ¼ section 22, township 43 north, range 35 west. And whereas certain professional services will be required in the General Land Office at Washington, it is hereby agreed between said Abram Mathews and W. C. Hill, of Washington, D. C., that in consideration of the said W. C. Hill having furnished the three certain Porterfield warrants above referred to, at $20 per acre, he shall be allowed, if he so elects, to receive the same back upon payment therefor to the said Abram Mathews the sum of $20 per acre in the event of the said applications being rejected and refused by the highest authority having jurisdiction over such matters.

It is hereby further agreed that in consideration of an undivided one-eighth (⅛) in and to the above-described lands, conditional upon the title thereto eventually resting in said Abram Mathews from the United States, the said W. C. Hill will, at his own expense, use his whole influence and legal ability in the direction of forcing the aforesaid applications to a successful issue, and, if possible for him to do so, secure patents from the United States for the aforesaid lands, all, or in part, in name of Abram Mathews.

In consideration of such influence and legal assistance, the said Abram Mathews hereby agrees, upon the receipt of patents from the United States covering the aforesaid lands, or any portion thereof, to deed to the said W. C. Hill an undivided one-eighth interest in and to such parcels of such lands as title may vest in him from the United States through the assistance and procurement of said Hill.

It is expressly agreed and understood and agreed by and between the parties hereto that in the event of the failure of said Hill to procure or cause to be procured patents from the United States to issue to and in the name of Abram Mathews, then he, the said W. C. Hill, is hereby estopped from demanding or receiving any compensation for his service in trying to secure the said patents.

Dated Washington, D. C., April 1, 1882.

EXHIBIT No. 79.

In connection with the above, the following from the Revised Statutes of the United States will be of interest:

"SEC. 2262. Before any person claiming the benefit of this chapter is allowed to enter lands he shall make oath before the receiver or register of the land district in which the land is situated that he has never had the benefit of any right of pre-emption under section 2259; that he is not the owner of 320 acres of land in any State or Territory; that he has not settled upon and improved such land to sell the same on speculation, but in good faith to appropriate to his own exclusive use; and that he has not, directly or indirectly, made any agreement or contract, in any way or manner, with any person whatsoever, by which the title which he might acquire from the Government of the United States should inure in whole or in part to the benefit of any person except himself; and if any person taking such oath swears falsely in the premises he shall forfeit the money which he may have paid for such land, and all right and title to the same; and any grant or conveyance which he may have made, except in the hands of bona fide purchasers, for a valuable consideration, shall be null and void, except as provided in section 2288.

* * * * * * *

"SEC. 5392. Every person who, having taken an oath before a competent tribunal, officer, or person, in any case in which a law of the United States authorizes an oath to be administered, that he will testify, declare, depose, or certify truly, or that any written testimony, declaration, deposition, or certificate by him subscribed is true, willfully and contrary to such oath, states or subscribes any material matter which he does not believe to be true, is guilty of perjury, and shall be punished by a fine of not more than $2,000, and by imprisonment, at hard labor, not more than five years; and shall, moreover, thereafter be incapable of giving testimony in any court of the United States until such time as the judgment against him is reversed.

Mr. HOAR. As I have said, going back a moment, the bondholders of this canal received bonds for which they paid cash to the amount of between $3,000,000 and $4,000,000. They then assessed themselves in cash over a million dollars more for the completion of the canal. When the improvement was finally completed, and the governor of Michigan had certified to the same, lands were duly selected and the lists were approved by the Secretary of the Interior. The bondholders then caused a foreclosure of the original mortgage, and the land was bid in for them at judicial sale.

Mr. PALMER. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. PALMER. Does the mortgage which these bonds represent cover the whole of the 400,000 acres granted for the canal?

Mr. HOAR. I do not know. It certainly covers these 15,000 acres. I suppose it covers all that the canal company then owned; but I am not particularly instructed on that point.

The present canal company was then organized and became the owner, as was supposed, of the canal and of the 400,000 acres of selected lands. The lands when selected were not known to be of much value. There were, as the Senator will perceive, but 400,000 acres in all—200,000 acres under each of the two grants.

Mr. PALMER. Will the Senator please repeat his statement?

Mr. HOAR. I say there were but 400,000 acres in all, 200,000 acres under each of the two grants. The first 200,000 being insufficient, the second act of which I spoke granted 200,000 acres more.

As I am informed—and I have no doubt it will not be questioned here—the entire tract of 400,000 acres could have been purchased for the price of a dollar and a quarter an acre, and that entire tract which could have been purchased at the time for at most half a million dollars is all that these men got as a consideration for the construction of this expensive and costly public work, amounting to $4,000,000 or $5,000,000 in its entire cost, except the work itself; and the tolls received on that canal were up to a recent period all expended in its construction and its support.

Mr. MCPHERSON. And the Government got free tolls also.

Mr. HOAR. And the Government got free tolls also, as the Senator from New Jersey suggests, in addition, as a part of its consideration.

As I said, it transpired, it came to the knowledge of the writers of the letters which have been read here that 15,000 acres of the land selected fell inside of the Ontonagon and State Line Railroad grant, an unearned grant upon which, however, there has been no action of forfeiture. The selection of the lands was imposed by law upon an agent to be named by the governor and approved by the Secretary of the Interior. The lands selected, therefore, were not selected by this canal company and so taken at their risk and they to be held responsible; but it was a Government officer who selected the lands for them, and the lists of selections of the lands when made by that agent were reported to the Secretary of the Interior and approved by him.

So, then, the mistake which alone requires any act of Congress to confirm the title, was a mistake made by a Government officer appointed by the Secretary of the Interior in the first place; and in the next place his action was reported to the highest officer of the Government dealing with that class of questions except the President himself, and approved by him. The canal company had no legal voice in the selection of a single acre of this entire domain, and much less had the present canal company or the present occupants who claim the land under and by virtue of its title for a valuable consideration as bona fide holders.

Mr. President, it is to be observed that in regard to this case, as in nearly all like cases, after the term of limitation provided in the railroad grant, which in this case was ten years, had expired, the General Land Office treated the lands affected by the grant as having reverted to the public domain, and disposed of them exactly as other public lands were disposed of. Not only were they selected for canal purposes, but they were sold at private entry at a dollar and a quarter an acre, and homesteaders and pre-emptors were permitted to settle upon them.

No serious question was ever raised in regard to this title until the decision of the Supreme Court in 17th Wallace, which took place some time in the latter part of the year 1874 or the beginning of 1875, if I am not mistaken—the case of Schulenberg vs. Harriman. All these canal selections were made previous to that decision.

Of course the members of the present canal company, being largely persons who were bondholders under the original canal company, were not residents of the State of Michigan—the bonds were all sold in the East—but I do not suppose it is for the interest, even if injustice could ever be for any man's interest, of the portions of this country which seek to invite capital from where it is accumulated and have it flow over and spread over them and bring them its benefits and blessings in the shape of public improvements, to treat such persons as outlaws and as not entitled to the protection of Congress. I suppose there is no stockholder of this company who resides in Michigan, but its shareholders are men who have built up for Michigan this important public in-provement when the capital of Michigan found itself unable or unwilling to do it.

The company, having put this amount of money in the lands, then investigated their value. They found that 25 or 30 per cent. of the whole amount was so utterly valueless that they have paid no taxes upon them, and they have been bid off to the State. Upon the rest of the lands they found some pine timber, and after expensive exploration they have developed a number of iron mines, and it was these iron mines and these timber lands which attracted the cupidity of the speculators.

Mr. President, but two questions have been raised with reference to the validity of the canal selections. The first one is whether the second statute, being in pari materia with the first, must not have, by construction, attached to it the limitation which was in the first act, and which required that the selection should be made within the distance prescribed from lands nearest the canal.

The second question is that a portion of the lands has been found to contain iron, while both grants excluded mineral land.

This first question, in addition to the facts which I have stated, that the selection was made by an agent of the governor and approved by the Secretary of the Interior, was submitted to the Attorney-General of the United States, and the Attorney-General gave two separate opinions upon it in the year 1874. It was Attorney-General Williams, but I suppose it is no impropriety to say that the opinions were written by Solicitor-General Phillips, one of the ablest and most admirable public officers we have had of late years in that Department. Both these opinions state in the clearest manner the opinion of the Attorney-General that the limitation of the first grant was not carried into the second, and that the last 200,000 acres might be selected from any public lands in the upper peninsula of Michigan. These two opinions will be found in a print entitled "Legislation by the United States and the State of Michigan in reference to Lake Superior Ship-Canal, Railway and Iron Company's Land Grant," pages 34–40. The opinion of the Attorney-General was accepted by the Secretary of the Interior, and the selections as made were approved.

Now, in regard to the second question whether they were entitled, when mineral lands were excepted, to select lands upon which iron mines were afterward discovered. In the fifth volume of the Opinions of Attorneys-General, page 247, it was decided by Attorney-General Crittenden that the word "mineral" does not apply to land containing iron mines, and I understand that ever since, now nearly forty years, that opinion has controlled the practice of all Departments of the Government.

The canal company have disposed of a portion of these lands in small lots to individual owners. None of these lands are fit for agricultural purposes. No one settler has gone there to get a home on a farm. The lands have been sold for their timber in some cases, and where a mine has been discovered they have been sold for the occupations which grow up along the mouth of a mine, for the benefit of the workmen and the population which the mine attracts.

The Senate Committee on Public Lands have twice unanimously recommended the confirmation of these canal titles, as I understand. The late Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Teller, recommended the same thing in his report, and he is the author of the amendment which is now pending.

Mr. PALMER. Will the Senator permit me to ask a question?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. PALMER. When did the Senate Committee on Public Lands recommend the confirmation of these titles?

Mr. HOAR. I have a reference to it here somewhere. I will get it.

Mr. PALMER. Any time. I merely interpolate the question because I may want to speak on it.

Mr. HOAR. In addition to this recommendation of Secretary Teller, Secretary Schurz in 1881 strongly recommended Congress to protect the interest of the canal company and of private purchasers, and on page 38 of the same pamphlet to which I have referred will be found his communication, inclosing a form of amendment to a then pending bill intended for this purpose.

So, then, we have as the fortification of this title which it is now sought to attack, in the first place, the payment four times over of the consideration; yes, ten times over; next, the selection under the approbation of the governor of Michigan; next, the selection of these lands by the public officer appointed for that purpose; next, the approbation of that selection by the Secretary of the Interior; next, two opinions of the Attorney-General of the United States; next, two recommendations of the Committee on Public Lands of this body; and next, the written official communications of two successive Secretaries of the Interior, and in addition to all that the disposition of this property for value to actual settlers who have put into it, in the work, in these mines, value many fold the original value of the land.

A pamphlet was laid on my desk just before I began in which there is an examination undertaking to show that there are only 22,642 acres of this land, which is in the hands of small individual owners, and that nineteen stockholders, who own the stock or bonds of the canal company, own the rest. Suppose they do, suppose it happens that there are nineteen men, who have paid their money and own part of the land, and that 22,642 acres (only about a tenth of the 200,000) are held by smaller proprietors, does that affect the justice of this question? But the significance is that the question put by the attorney at the hearing, tending to call out these facts, is pushed by this same gentleman, Mr. Redington, whose name appears on the letter in which the writers say they know that the settlers, the men who go on and pre-empt in this matter, will have to commit perjury; and in the next letter they say that if they do not carry the thing out they have a moral twist on them.

Mr. PALMER. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. PALMER. Since the Senator made his remark in regard to an alleged contract I have received this card:

> The genuineness of the contract has been denied under oath by me in the Interior Department. No such contract ever existed.
> JAMES K. REDINGTON.

Mr. HOAR. All I can say is that this contract and these letters were put in evidence in a hearing in the Interior Department. Does the Senator deny that the original letters, of which these are copies, are on file in the handwriting of that gentleman in the Interior Department?

Mr. PALMER. I neither deny nor affirm, for I know nothing about it.

Mr. HOAR. I am so informed. If it be true that those original letters and contract are on file in the Department, will the Senator assert that this denial of the genuineness of the letters and contract—it is there apparently in all the forms of an ordinary contract—is of very much importance?

Mr. PALMER. I should think not; I am free to confess it; but I wish to state to the Senator from Massachusetts that this very discussion has developed what I have contended for all along, and so will develop more and more to the end of the discussion; and that is that this amendment has no business on this railroad forfeiture bill. The attorneys of this canal company in this city, like a ferret, have watched all these railroad forfeiture bills.

Mr. HOAR. That is not the question. I know nothing of this gentleman. I should be sorry to do him any injustice whatever. I give my entire authority for what I have called to the attention of the Senate. I am informed by a gentleman who appears to represent this canal company and the claimants under it that these facts are on file, the original letters and what purports to be a copy of this contract. It may not have been delivered; there may be something to allow him to deny that there was any such genuine contract; but a paper purporting and pretending to operate as a contract when it is signed is there, and I can not see any reason for doubting the entire genuineness and good faith of the suggestion about it.

Now, to come to the suggestion of my honorable friend, I think it is in place in this discussion to put this amendment on the bill. Here was a grant to a railroad which never earned the grant. There was a subsequent grant to a canal company, which did pay the consideration four times over, and when that canal company selected its lands it selected them partly from land which had previously been granted to the railroad company and which the railroad company had not earned. The lands were selected not by the canal company, but by the public officer to whose decision they were obliged by law to submit, under the direction of the governor of Michigan, reported to and confirmed by the Secretary of the Interior, on the opinion of the Attorney-General of the United States, and these men were helpless to make any other selection. They performed the conditions first, and their $5,000,000 have been paid out; but they were as helpless to have done anything else as they would be under the decision of the Supreme Court itself. Now there comes before the Senate a bill to forfeit that railroad land grant, a general bill, and the forfeiture covers this selection, and if you forfeit that you put the title of these men back into the United States and leave these bogus and fraudulent entrymen to make their claim, to throw a cloud on the title of every miner's cabin, to throw a cloud on the titles even to the grave-yard where the children of the people who have gone there to develop this land are buried, as I said. In one instance these men put their claims on a grave-yard.

I undertake to say that if there is a spark of the sense of justice in this body, which represents the just, honest, generous American people, if there is any time when they should confirm this title, it is the time when they are forfeiting the railroad grant and thereby throwing a cloud upon it. In the next place, if there were no bill here, I undertake to say that the proper time to confirm this title is the very first moment after Congress learns the facts and can get at it.

Mr. PALMER. I agree with the Senator on that point.

Mr. HOAR. And as it is in order to move a proposition to confirm these titles, speaking as one Senator, I think it is my duty to do it without delay.

Mr. CHACE. Will the Senator from Massachusetts let me ask him a question?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. CHACE. I fail to discover that this statement of facts has been impeached. Has there been any attempt to impeach this statement?

Mr. HOAR. I have not heard of any. I asked my honorable friend from Michigan, who I suppose is in full communication with the other side, whether he is prepared to deny the fact about these letters, and he says he is not.

Mr. PALMER. Does the Senator wish me to answer now?

Mr. HOAR. You did answer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators must address the Chair.

Mr. HOAR. I am merely repeating the question which I asked the Senator some time ago, and the answer he made then.

Mr. PALMER. I said I neither denied nor affirmed in regard to those statements of fact. There are a great many of them which the honorable Senator seems to have got by hearsay, and I wish to be very exact when I make a statement positively. In regard to the pathetic grave-yard story, I am informed that it never existed at all; that the canal company never owned a grave-yard.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the honorable Senator from Michigan again if he denies that the persons who claim to be homesteaders or pre-emptioners against this title that I am speaking of are persons who were sent in there by the writer of these letters under a contract?

Mr. PALMER. Does the Senator wish me to answer?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. PALMER. I will say that I do not know by whom they were sent in. I know that for seven or eight years there have been homesteaders there, farms have been cleared up, and they are in possession now. But that is not the material point, for I think that they are pretty safe even under the Senator's amendment. What I contend is that under the shadow of a beneficent bill an effort is being made to smuggle the confirmation of this grant through, which should be considered on its merits alone and not confused with other matters.

Mr. HOAR. I do not know what my honorable friend's notion of smuggling is. It rather strikes me that this amendment of mine is regularly entered in the custom-house and brought to the notice of the collector, and so it has come to Congress.

Mr. PALMER. Will the Senator just answer me this question——

Mr. HOAR. My honorable friend rose for a question and under the guise of a question proceeded to say that I or somebody was smuggling this thing in Congress, and I think I am entitled to reply to that by the observation that if there ever was a proposed measure of legislation on earth that was regularly entered in the custom-house in the face of day, and any appeal on the subject brought to Congress, it is this amendment of mine.

Mr. PALMER. I ask the Senator if his amendment was ever referred to a committee?

Mr. HOAR. It is an amendment which two Secretaries of the Interior have transmitted to Congress in succession, urging them to adopt it, Carl Schurz and Mr. TELLER, who are not often found agreeing on other things; and it has been pending here for days. The measure has been here since last week. The general purpose that we had was made known to the Senate last week, and the facts were all disclosed in a printed document, a hearing in the Department of the Interior. That is what my honorable friend from Michigan describes as smuggling.

Mr. PALMER. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him? If he is going to address me, he must permit me to answer, or else ask a question.

Mr. HOAR. I am addressing the entire Senate.

Mr. PALMER. But he was looking and pointing at me as if I were the object of his remarks.

Mr. HOAR. No; I was addressing the entire Senate, and I looked at the Senator from Michigan simply because he is the most dignified and the most handsome member of the body, but without any personal purpose whatever.

Mr. PALMER. The Senator himself excepted, Mr. President.

Mr. HOAR. We have here the affidavits of twenty-two persons showing the character of the contracts which they made, one or two of which were read from the desk, and showing that fraudulent and illegal contracts were made.

Mr. PALMER. Of what date, may I ask the Senator?

Mr. HOAR. Here is the affidavit of Mr. George M. Buckley, sworn to on the 15th day of July, 1884. He refers to a conversation with one of the firm of Redington & Hill.

Deponent further testifies that in the latter part of the month of October, 1882, there came to Iron River one W. C. Hill, who represented that he was an attorney and doing business at Washington, D. C.; that in a conversation held with deponent said Hill offered to take cases for any and all persons who would settle on any lands in Iron River township and conduct them before the Department of Interior at Washington. Said Hill also told deponent that all entries made with cash in said township would be canceled, and recommended settlers to squat on said lands. Said Hill further told deponent that the only terms on which he would conduct cases for settlers was one-fourth interest in the land and that he would not work them on any other terms. And deponent further says that said John B. Weimer became an agent for said Hill, and made a business of locating settlers on lands that had previously been entered for cash, charging a regular fee for his services. And deponent says further that upon one occasion he was present when said Weimer located two settlers on claims and heard the agreements, the terms of which were one-fourth interest in each claim, to be conveyed to Weimer and Hill jointly when the titles should be perfected in the squatters.

As I said, here are twenty-two distinct similar affidavits. There are twenty-five according to the memorandum, but I make the number twenty-two. Here are the forms of the contracts given, providing that the attorneys shall have a share in the land, and those contracts were made with these various persons. Here are the letters of the parties to the same effect, all given.

Here is a document which has been drawn off and left with me at my request. It is a list of the homestead and pre-emption filings made in the local land office of Marquette during 1882, 1883, and subsequent years, and certified to by the register of the land office at that place. Here is the official certificate, the original paper. This shows in that little territory of 15,000 acres over five hundred filings of persons pretending to be actual homesteaders or pre-emptioners, or whatever they were, on land which had been previously taken up and which had been entered in that very land office before.

Mr. PALMER. I ask the Senator, if he will permit me to interrupt him, how many acres did each homesteader take?

Mr. HOAR. I can not say, but the number is given here. Here is the date and the subdivision.

Mr. PALMER. Let me look at that.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator may look at it. I send this statement, with the leave of the Senate, to the Reporter, to be incorporated in my remarks—the whole thing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so incorporated if there be no objection.

The statement referred to is as follows:

* Patented. † Approved January 11, 1854. ‡ Act September 28, 1850.

I hereby certify that the foregoing schedule (pages 1 to 20, inclusive) embraces the homestead and pre-emption applications and subsequent action has thereon, together with the entries with which they conflict, in the townships and parts of townships found in the 6 miles limits common to both branches of the Chicago, Saint Paul and Fond du Lac Railroad, odd sections in which were granted to above-named road by act of June 3, 1856.

V. B. COCHRAN, Register.

UNITED STATES LAND OFFICE, MARQUETTE, MICH., February 5, 1884.

(418 in all. All in 1882 and 1883, except 2).

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask any member of this body if he believes that within a limit of 15,000 acres and within a space of two years there were five hundred entries made of land which was previously entered and recorded in the land office of that district by mere accident by men who were acting in good faith?

Mr. PALMER. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. PALMER. Do I understand the Senator to say that there were over five hundred applications, or that there were five hundred entries?

Mr. HOAR. Five hundred entries.

Mr. PALMER. The lowest entry is a subdivision of 40 acres. Some of those entries are 80's and some of them 160's. They never take any less than 80 acres. If there were five hundred entries at 160 acres each it would require 80,000 acres to fill the bill.

Mr. HOAR. But some of these entries are seven deep on the same land. That is another proof of the fraud of the whole business. There are some of them from seven to ten deep.

Mr. PALMER. I am glad that I brought out that explanation, for arithmetically it was very funny. The Senator is under obligations to me for bringing out the explanation.

Mr. HOAR. It may be very funny to my honorable friend from Michigan; but it is very disagreeable to a man who happens to own a little cabin or a little plot of land which he has improved, to have seven or ten fellows separately putting their entries onto his own land.

Here are something like a dozen witnesses to the fact that a large portion of these people never made settlement, or attempted it; that they never made a real entry at all; that it was a land office performance without anything practical belonging to it.

I do not wish to detain the Senate beyond all reason and patience, because while this is a very important matter to these people it is an individual or special matter compared with the great subjects of general legislation which we have to reach. But here is a large number of affidavits stating the value and character of the lands on which these entries are made. Here is one which I will read as a specimen. It is the affidavit of Mr. Thomas Luxmore, of Marquette County, Michigan. I think very likely my honorable friend may know the man. He seems to be a respectable man, in high standing, and I suppose, therefore, he would be likely to be known to the Senators from that State.

STATE OF MICHIGAN, Marquette County, ss:

Thomas Luxmore, being duly sworn, on oath deposes and says that he is a resident of the village of Iron River, Marquette County, Michigan; and that since in the year 1881 he has been the superintendent of the Nandimo mine, an iron mine located on the SW. ¼ of SW. ¼ of section 26, in township 43 north, of range 35 west, in the county and State aforesaid, and that in exploring and opening said mine, and in erecting and maintaining a mining plant, buildings, etc., for the purpose of operating the same, there has been expended a sum of between one hundred and fifty and one hundred and sixty thousand dollars, and that on said mine 370 feet of exploring has been done, 329 feet of shafts sunk, and 857½ feet of drifts run; and the mining plant, buildings, etc., belonging to said mine, and on said lands, are substantially as follows, to wit: Four tubular stationary boilers, one 16 by 20 inch engine, one tubular boiler and hoisting engine, three 4-foot Lane drums, one shaft-house, two pockets, two skip roads (one 185 feet and one 220 feet long), seven Knowles pumps, numbers 4 to 9, two derricks, about 1,400 feet of trestle, averaging about 18 feet in height, about a mile of railroad side-track, 2,200 cords of wood, 20,000 feet of mining timber, tram cars, skips, pipes, buckets, wagons, sleds, etc., one boarding-house, two-story, 26 by 40, with kitchen attached, two frame dwellings, each 20 by 30, with kitchens attached, together with a large lot of miscellaneous tools, barns, sheds, etc., too numerous to mention.

Jerome B. Schwartz, being duly sworn, on oath deposes and says that * * * besides being the superintendent of the Alpha Iron Company, he is engaged in keeping a general store in said Crystal Falls, and that he is fully conversant with all the buildings in said village, and that he has carefully examined the list of buildings in said Crystal Falls hereto attached, and as to the number and kind of buildings set forth in it, knows it to be true and correct, and as to the estimated cost of said buildings, believes it to be fair and just.

Said deponent further deposes and says that at various times he has purchased of the Crystal Falls Iron Company and other parties lots on the town site of said Crystal Falls, and has made valuable improvements and erected valuable buildings thereon, and that said lots, with the said improvements and buildings, have cost him in the aggregate several thousand dollars, and that he has always understood his title to said property to be good and indefeasible, etc.

It is not necessary to delay the Senate by reading this whole pamphlet. It is that kind of property upon which this army of fraudulent land sharks was dispatched with the expectation that the Congress of the United States would forfeit the railroad company's grant and not confirm the title arising under the canal grant in consequence of this technicality, and then these people would come here and present themselves as honest and decent and respectable homesteaders or pre-emptioners.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, the bill under consideration was reported after long and mature deliberation from the Committee on Public Lands. That bill simply proposes to forfeit to the United States all lands opposite that portion of any railroad throughout the United States which has not now been completed or which is not completed at the time of the passage of the act.

So far as I was individually concerned, as a member of the committee, I was in favor of going further than that and not only forfeiting what is called the unearned lands, those opposite the uncompleted portions of the railroad, but all those lands opposite that part of the railroad which was not completed within the time specified by Congress. I was overruled, however, by the Committee on Public Lands, and the bill simply and solely proposes now to forfeit to the United States those lands where the railroad has not been built at the time of the passage of this act; and the bill should pass, and certainly no one will contend that those lands should not be forfeited.

The question was considered whether in making this forfeiture Congress ought to undertake to take care of the rights of certain settlers or certain other claimants where there were conflicts throughout many States in the Union, but the committee saw that in many cases these causes were pending in court, and if they undertook to give one party an advantage over another probably great wrong and injustice would be done. Therefore, as the bill is reported it leaves the pre-emption men, the homestead claimants, the canal company, and all others claiming a right in these lands to their rights in court and before the Interior Department without interfering with them in any way whatever.

The amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts proposes to go further than the committee and confirm to this canal company 400,000 acres of land in the State of Michigan, and to confirm to those who purchased at cash entry some 40,000 or 50,000 acres of land in the State of Michigan and how many acres in other States outside of Michigan I do not know. The Senate will bear in mind that the homestead claimants, the pre-emption claimants, the canal men, the railroad men, and the cash-entry men are now in the courts of the country and before the Interior Department with lawsuits in regard to these particular lands. The canal company is unwilling to take its chances before the Interior Department and it is unwilling to take its chances before the courts of the country, but comes now with an amendment and seeks through Congress to obtain a confirmation where the case is now pending before the Secretary of the Interior, if it is not already, as I believe, pending in the courts of the country.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BERRY. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. Suppose the selection made by the former Secretary of the Interior and the Government agent to be defective because the forfeiture had not been declared, have these people any remedy except in Congress? Can they get any remedy before the courts of the country?

Mr. BERRY. I will answer the Senator from Massachusetts that the Secretary of the Interior has decided that those lands were reconveyed to the United States under the joint resolution of July 5, 1862. Whether that will be held to be good law by the courts I do not pretend to decide, but under the bill as it comes from the Committee on Public Lands these parties will be left in precisely the same situation that they are in now. The bill, as it comes from the Committee on Public Lands, does not propose to give the pre-emption settler or the homestead settler any advantage over the canal company. The settlers do not ask it, but they do ask Congress not to legislate this land to the canal company and thereby deprive them of their homes.

The men who hold under the homestead law, the men who hold under pre-emption, the men who have their homes upon that land and their farms there, and, as the Senator from Massachusetts has said, no doubt their grave-yards there, do not ask Congress to give them an advantage over this great canal company. All they ask is that in making this forfeiture their rights be not tampered with, and that the Congress of the United States shall not confer this land upon this canal company, said to be worth from $25,000,000 to $40,000,000. That is the question presented here.

I ask the Senate to bear in mind that the amendment proposed by the Senator does not confirm the title of the homestead men. It does not give them any advantage whatever; but the men who entered at cash entry and the canal company are seeking to have Congress pass upon their rights, which they are afraid to risk in the courts of the country.

Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts said—and I hope he will do me the honor to give me his attention—that the selections were made in the State of Michigan; that the canal company had nothing to do with making the selections. I understood him to say that the lands were selected in accordance with law. I do not propose to make an assertion here to-day, but I propose to read from a report made in the Forty-ninth Congress by the Committee on Public Lands of the other House, through Mr. Henley, of California; made after weeks and months of patient investigation; made after proofs taken by many witnesses; and I propose to show that that committee came to the conclusion that the company never built the canal according to contract; that they did not comply with scarcely one single regulation provided by Congress in making the grant.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BERRY. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I ask if the certificate of the governor and of the Secretary of the Interior is not conclusive on that point?

Mr. BERRY. I will answer the Senator. If the certificate of the governor is conclusive, as the Senator asks, in a legal point of view, then I say that this evidence as to whether or not they actually did the work is important, because they are coming to Congress asking for equity; they are coming here and asking equitable relief at the hands of the Congress of the United States, and if we can show that they never complied with any of their part of the contract, then it is important as bearing on the question of whether Congress shall grant the equities which they ask. That committee, as I said, reported as follows:

Congress granted 400,000 acres of the public domain to aid in building a canal less than 2 miles long. It incumbered this munificent donation with few limitations and restrictions, but among the things that it did expressly require were a breakwater, a harbor, and a ship-canal of certain dimensions. By a breakwater was intended a structure of some kind capable of breaking the force of the storms that lash the shores of Superior, and thus affording protection to the entrance of the canal; by a harbor was meant a place of safety for vessels entering or leaving the canal, and by a canal 100 feet in width, with a depth of not less than 13 feet, was meant a canal of that width and depth, so constructed as to be permanently navigable from end to end by vessels drawing that amount of water. All this the company were under obligations to furnish to the citizens of the United States before it was legally or equitably entitled to an acre of the grant. As matter of fact it has never to this day given the public such a breakwater, harbor, or canal.

The only breakwater built consists of two parallel piers running from the shore of Lake Superior a distance of some 900 feet into the lake. The only harbor is that formed by these piers. The only canal is a ditch running from Portage Lake to Lake Superior, about 2 miles in length, so insufficiently protected at its sides that every year since its alleged completion sand has drifted through and filled up the channel to a depth of from 2 to 5 feet. The so-called harbor, instead of being a place of safety, is, in stormy weather, actually a place of danger, navigators preferring in some instances to run north around Keweenaw Point, rather than attempt to enter the canal between the piers. (Testimony of Captain Shannon, page 347.)

* * * * * * *

The resultant disability is such that deep-draught vessels, intending to pass through the canal, habitually load at Eastern ports with express reference to discharging portions of their cargo before reaching Portage Lake.

* * * * * * *

In view of the foregoing your committee are of the opinion that the work as completed was so defective as to be practically a fraud upon the intention of Congress; that the company failed, within the period of limitation, and ever since has failed, to construct, within the meaning of the act of Congress, a breakwater, a harbor, or a ship-canal of the specified dimensions.

This committee report, after patient investigation, that the canal was never completed in accordance with the contract. But that is not all. This committee find and report that the selections made by the canal company were in direct violation of the act of Congress, and therefore for that reason were a fraud. The Senator from Massachusetts said that the lands were selected by the agent of the State of Michigan, that the canal company had nothing whatever to do with it. I assert here—and if I am incorrect I ask the Senator from Michigan to correct me—that it has been charged that the president of the canal company was appointed agent by the governor of Michigan to make the selections, and that the selections were in point of fact made by the president of the canal company. I state that the evidence, in addition to that testified to before the House committee, is that when they were making these selections the Register of the Land Office refused to allow them to select certain lands laid down there, that they endeavored in every way to get him to agree to them, that he continued to refuse, and that the president of the company came here and through a member of Congress secured the register's removal, and the appointment of another man who did make these selections outside of the act of Congress.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator speaks of the president of the canal company and a Representative. I should like to inquire of him to which canal company he refers?

Mr. BERRY. My opinion is that it was the original canal company which afterwards failed.

Mr. DAWES. The mortgage was foreclosed and another corporation was formed of the persons, and the title was condemned in the courts under a foreclosure, and purchased by people in New Jersey and New York and Massachusetts, and they made a president of the new company. You do not allude to him?

Mr. BERRY. My recollection is—I am not certain that it is accurate—but my recollection is that the original company or the persons who advanced to it money had a mortgage and that the lands were sold under that mortgage and were purchased in by the new company, which probably consisted of some of the original company or parties who had furnished the money and had held the bonds. I have that impression from reading the testimony. I will not say it is absolutely correct.

Mr. DAWES. The new company was formed by capitalists who never had anything to do with the original company at all. The new corporation was formed after the property was sold under judgment of a court under the foreclosure, and then men went into the market and induced these people to put their money in in the way stated.

Now, one other thing. My friend has been reading from a report of a House committee. Does he know of how many that committee consisted?

Mr. BERRY. I do not know; I suppose the usual numbers of a House committee.

Mr. DAWES. I see that five of them signed a minority report.

Mr. BERRY. Perhaps the House Committee on Public Lands consisted of eleven. I do not know. The Senator from Massachusetts was in the other House a long time and perhaps he knows.

Mr. DAWES. The explanation of it is this: Three of them set forth that the conclusions of fact of those who constitute the majority are not correct, and then proceed to say:

Without entering into any of the reasons of either the majority or minority reports, much of which we do not indorse, we are content to state our conclusions as members of the committee, and we concur in the resolution that the evidence fails to show that the lands granted are forfeited.

Two members of the committee sign that.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, this selection was not only void for that reason, but it was void for another reason, and a reason of which all parties who have since purchased could have notice and are chargeable with notice under the law, and can not claim to be innocent purchasers. The original act granting 200,000 acres provided that they should be selected from lands nearest the canal. This same committee reports what I will read:

Under the act of 1865, therefore, the company was entitled to 200,000 acres of alternate odd sections, of the character described, lying in compact form nearest to the location of the canal. It was charged by the investigators, and has been demonstrated by the testimony, that of the lands actually selected there are nearly, if not quite, 100,000 acres in the extreme western portion of the upper peninsula, between the Montreal River and Lake Agogebic, further from the canal than 100,000 acres of other lands falling within the grants and which should have been selected.

The facts are that while it was expressly provided that they should be taken from lands nearest the canal, there were other lands, which at that time were believed to be copper lands, selected in direct violation of the law. In fraud of the action of Congress they skipped over the inferior lands, leaving 100,000 acres, and selected 80,000 acres of very valuable land in the State of Michigan.

Mr. McPHERSON. Of what selection does the Senator speak?

Mr. BERRY. I speak of the selection under the first act. This committee say they left 100,000 acres between the canal and the selection of 100,000 other acres that they made, and they did it because it was far more valuable and because it was believed at that time to be copper land, notwithstanding the act of Congress prohibited the selection of mineral lands expressly and directly.

It turned out afterwards that they were not copper lands, but contained iron ore, immensely valuable; and these lands were selected, as I said, directly in violation of the first act of Congress, which said the selection should be made from the land nearest the canal.

The second act of Congress, granting 200,000 acres more, did not in express terms say that they should be selected from the lands nearest the canal. It was contended, however, that the two acts should be construed together and that such was the meaning. The Attorney-General of the United States decided differently. He decided under the last act that they could select other lands.

But there is another difficulty in the way. The House committee find and report the law to be that they were bound to select lands subject to private entry, and yet the decision of the Secretary of the Interior has held that these odd sections were not subject to private entry.

That is the history of the canal grant, this canal costing, I believe the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] said, four or five million dollars; I do not remember the exact amount. These parties now come to Congress and ask us to confirm to them lands estimated to be worth from twenty-five to forty million dollars. They come in claiming no legal right; they come and say that they have certain equitable rights which the courts will not allow, and therefore they ask Congress to give them these rights; and yet they do that in the face of the fact that this testimony shows that the president of the company while acting as State agent was president of the company making selections; they ask it in the face of the fact that they were required to take the lands nearest the canal, and yet they went many miles from there to get valuable land.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator pardon me for a question?

Mr. BERRY. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator inform me what he means by saying that "they went" when the thing was done by a public officer appointed by the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. BERRY. I beg the Senator's pardon. He speaks of the appointee of the governor of Michigan.

Mr. HOAR. Approved by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. BERRY. But the governor of Michigan appointed the president of the canal company to make the selections. That was the statement I made.

Mr. HOAR. I never heard of that before.

Mr. BERRY. If I am incorrect, the Senator from Michigan will correct me.

The amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts goes further than this. The Senator's amendment proposes to confirm all the cash entries, and not only to confirm to the canal company, but to confirm to those persons who have bought for cash, while the Secretary of the Interior, in the case of George M. Wakefield vs. H. Cutter, Edward Frank, and Charles Laydon, holds in regard to the odd sections:

As to the odd sections, Congress fixed a further condition upon the reacquisition of these lands by requiring them to be reoffered at public sale, and this reoffering at public auction was a condition precedent to the rights of entry of said sections.

The ruling in the case of Pecard vs. Camens does not apply to the odd sections, but on the contrary the reason stated in said decision for sending the entries of the even sections to the board of equitable adjudication furnishes a sufficient reason for refusing the present application.

He holds in this decision, which the Senator, can read, and, I presume, has read, that the cash entries to the odd sections were absolutely void, that they were not subject to sale under cash entries, yet persons have gone there and have bought thousands of acres of these immensely valuable lands, paying $1.25 an acre for them, in violation of the law. They are contesting with the parties who settled there under pre-emption and homestead claims, contesting with parties who have their homes there and have lived there for years and years. They are contesting in the courts.

Those who hold under the homestead and pre-emption laws are willing to trust their rights to the courts of the country. The Secretary of the Interior has already decided in their favor. And yet, under this amendment, the Congress of the United States would by this act confirm to those who made these cash entries fifty or sixty thousand acres, confirm to them lands worth twenty-five to forty dollars an acre, and turn out of their homesteads and pre-emptions the families there settled. That is the effect of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts.

I insist that when the Senator speaks of those who have homes he is mistaken as to the effect of his amendment. The effect of his amendment is to turn them out of house and home and give to this canal company lands worth from twenty-five to forty million dollars, to give them to these cash-entry men who entered in violation of law, as decided by the Secretary of the Interior, whose entry was void, and all that they could ask would be to have the money refunded to them by the Government of the United States. It is sought on this bill to turn these people out of their homes when the courts of the country are now adjudicating their claims.

If the bill passes as it came from the Committee on Public Lands, it leaves the parties in precisely the same situation as they stood before. If the law is in favor of the canal company, its rights will not be affected. If the pre-emption and homestead settlers are entitled to the preference, their rights are not affected one way or the other. If the men who entered under sales for cash have rights, if the Secretary of the Interior decided wrongly and the courts shall hold that these men's claims are equitable and valid, this act will not interfere with them in any way. But if the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts is adopted, it will have the effect, as I have before stated, to confirm the claims that these men with all their immense wealth, with all their surroundings, are unwilling to trust to the courts of the country; and if they have no legal title to this land I insist that when they come to us asking equity we have a perfect right to inquire as to whether or not these lands were selected in the manner provided by law or whether they were selected in fraud of the law.

I will read one more section from the House committee's report:

To summarize, we find the following selections illegal, covering land not included in the grant, the figures being general, namely:

	Acres.
Under grant of 1865	100,000
Under grant of 1866, at least	30,000
Under former construction, additional, about	150,000
Total	280,000

That is, the last act is to be construed in connection with the former. Then there would be 150,000 acres additional, but without that there are 130,000 acres of this land which this committee find were selected contrary to law. Now I will read the summing up of the committee in regard to the cash entries:

Your committee is unable to resist the conclusion, under all the facts of the case, that not only were these private entries invalid and illegal, but that certainly, in some cases, they must have been made fraudulently and by collusion with the officers of the local land office. They are, accordingly, of opinion that an act confirming them should not be passed.

These are the lands which were taken under private entry.

Now, Mr. President, I think I have said all I wish to say upon this question.

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the Senator permit me to ask a question?

Mr. BERRY. Certainly.

Mr. McPHERSON. Has the Government at any time offered any of the lands that had been credited to the canal company by reason of the State selections to private purchasers? Have any of them been sold to private purchasers? In other words, has the Government at all times recognized the right of the canal company to these lands after they were selected?

Mr. BERRY. My impression is that there were homestead settlers and pre-emption claimants who made filings. Those have never been confirmed by the Interior Department. I will state to the Senator, however, that the Government probably also recognized cash entries until the decision of the Secretary of the Interior whereby he decided that all the entries on even sections were voidable, but might be confirmed by the board, and that all the entries on odd sections were absolutely void, and that the parties had no title to them whatever.

Mr. McPHERSON. But the status of the lands that were regularly credited to the canal company according to the Senator's own statement will be voided now by reason of the decisions made at this late day by the Interior Department. No decision was made by the Interior Department, as I understand, that in any way affected the credit of the canal company or the ownership of the canal company in this land until such time as they had been selected and bonds had been issued.

Mr. BERRY. I answer the Senator that there had been no decision, but the law was that they were to be selected nearest the canal. It was not complied with. I assert, furthermore, that they could only be selected from lands subject to private entry. This was undeniably so under the first grant of 1865, and the parties who loaned money, or parties who took mortgages on them or became interested by purchase or otherwise, were bound to take notice of what the law was, and can not come in here before Congress and ask them to do equity and confirm their claims, especially so when the lands were selected in fraud of the act of Congress.

If under the decision of the courts they had a right to select these lands, if there had been no fraud whatever, if the lands were selected in the manner indicated by the act of Congress, these parties can recover in the courts of the country; and why is it that they come here and seek legislation to give them an advantage over their opponents in cases now pending before the courts of the United States, and that, too, when those opponents are pre-emption settlers and homesteaders, men of families, poor men who usually are unable to contest with such a company as this canal company, or the parties who purchased the lands at private entry? The homestead settlers have not asked any confirmation. There is nothing in the bill as it comes from the Committee on Public Lands giving them any confirmation; but they do insist that the Congress of the United States shall not deprive them of their homes and give them to this corporation, which never complied with the law, which never expended one-tenth the money that these lands are worth on the market to-day in building the canal. That is what they ask, and I think it is a just claim, and one which ought to be respected.

Mr. McPHERSON obtained the floor.

Mr. DOLPH. Will the Senator from New Jersey give way to me for a moment? I wish to offer a substitute for this amendment, and I presume he desires to discuss the merits of the question.

Mr. McPHERSON. I shall give way to the Senator to offer his proposition.

Mr. DOLPH. I should like five minutes to state it.

Mr. McPHERSON. I will give way to enable the substitute to be offered and read.

Mr. DOLPH. And explained?

Mr. McPHERSON. I intend to occupy the floor not more than five or ten minutes myself.

Mr. DOLPH. I will not interfere with the Senator.

Mr. McPHERSON. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] has relieved me of the necessity of entering into an extended discussion of the amendment, and therefore I shall be very brief.

It seems to me that the amendment before the Senate is one that is entitled to a great deal of consideration. It was the policy of this Government in its earlier days to make grants of land for the purpose of building wagon-roads all over this country. There are many instances recently on the part of Congress of a disposition to undertake to annul and make void the grants of land given to wagon-roads in some of the States and Territories. There is scarcely a State containing public lands but has had some benefit from the grants either by an appropriation of land or money for the purpose of building wagon-roads.

Now we come down to the year 1856, and that was about the earliest date in which public lands were donated by the Government to aid the construction of canals and railroads. For instance, here was a canal which was needed on the northern peninsula of Michigan. It was intended to cut off a very large loop by cutting a canal across a point of land extending into Lake Superior, and a very dangerous route to navigation. The great interests of the Western country beyond that at the headwaters of Lake Superior depended upon something being done whereby the navigation of the lakes could be rendered easy and safe.

If you look at a map to-day you find at the headwaters of Lake Superior great towns like Ashland, Duluth, and other places where commerce exists and railway lines have reached the headwaters of the lake, and thence radiating and collecting the commerce of that great western world extending through States and Territories clear to the Pacific Ocean. It is brought down through Lake Superior, and much of it comes through this very canal.

The United States granted a certain amount of land at one time for each mile of construction of a railroad which was to run from Ontonagon, on Lake Superior, to some point on the Wisconsin line, and also for a line of road reaching from that same point to Marquette. The grantees began to build the railroad, and, as I think, built the first 10 or 15 miles of the road. It was really built not in a substantial way; and it has been asserted and proved that the road was laid upon snow banks, having snow for a foundation several feet deep. Upon the construction of such a structure they demanded a certain number of acres of land. They came down to the southerly end of the proposed line, where the lands were more valuable, and actually did at that point get control, as I understand from the Interior Department, and ownership of a certain amount of land, provided, however, that the entire road should first be built; the grant being a conditional one, and depending upon the full completion of the road.

Then they abandoned the road and practically notified the Department that they intended to go no further in the work. The lands that had been turned over to them by the Interior Department as a natural consequence went back into the public domain because the road had never been completed; in short, they abandoned it.

What then was done? This projected improvement of a canal was contemplated, and from the year 1860 up to 1865 the Congress of the United States was asked for a grant of land to build it. Under the act of 1865 200,000 acres of land were given for the construction of the canal. There is not an acre of land that to-day is worth or ever has been worth one-half dollar per acre. It is nothing but rocky, sandy, barren, treeless waste. At that time Northern Michigan was nothing but a wilderness. There were no people there; there was nothing there except the land, and yet at the same time there was that great lake reaching around the northern peninsula and the headwaters of that lake reaching to a very fertile region beyond. There were no railroads in the vicinity; but soon beyond the headwaters of Lake Superior population began to go, where since an hundred cities have been built up and immense railroad lines have been laid.

There was a grant of 200,000 acres of land for the canal, and so far as I can learn by any evidence in the Interior Department, all the proceedings were formal and regular and legal so far as the selection of the lands for the canal was concerned.

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator allow me to correct him? If they were all legal, why do they come and ask Congress to confirm them? Why do they seek to have Congress interfere?

Mr. MCPHERSON. The Senator knows full well why it is. Because the title is disputed upon technical grounds, which, considering the action taken by Congress and the State of Michigan, together with the action of the Federal officers, it would be unbecoming in this Congress to assist.

In 1866 Congress passed another act; and there was no restriction in the act of 1866 confining the canal company to lands contiguous to the canal, but they were permitted by an agent selected by the governor of the State, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, whoever he might be, to make selections of land anywhere in the northern peninsula of Michigan.

They selected, as any individual would do, the very best land they could find that was subject to selection under the act of 1866, and in making selections they did come down along the line of this railroad which it had been proposed to build from Ontonagon to the State line, and they took possession of some 15,000 acres of that land. It was land belonging to the General Government. The railroad company had abandoned it and had abandoned the construction of the line; they had no claim to it. That land has since been found to be valuable. At the time of which I speak there was very little value in it. So far as I can learn there was then no idea of the great iron deposit since developed on that peninsula. Copper mines were known, and they were being worked on the peninsula.

This canal company proceeded with their work, expended $3,000,000, became involved, went into bankruptcy, and their works were practically sold out. Everybody supposed the canal company was at an end. The people who held the company's bonds, getting the best legal advice they could obtain, believed there was a good title to the lands, and that the bonds which were based upon them were good and valid bonds. Those bonds were sold in the market. The bondholders to-day stand as innocent purchasers of that property. Whatever else they got, they got the incomplete canal. In addition to the purchase of these bonds and the investment they made in the bonds they have put $1,000,000 in cash in the work of completing the canal, and the canal was completed, and it has been in operation from that time to this, and at the present time the canal company gives all the tolls every year towards keeping the canal in repair.

What have they received? They have received 400,000 acres of the public land in Northern Michigan, which at that time could not have been sold for a dollar and a quarter an acre. No iron had then been discovered. What else did they receive? Nothing in the world from the Government, but they gave the Government the right to use the canal free of toll. What have they received for the money they expended? Nothing in the world, then, except the lands. These lands, after investigation, were found to contain iron. The Government itself did not know they were mineral lands. There was no claim on the part of the Government that they were mineral lands, and it was nothing in the world but the discovery that the canal company and its agents made as people moved on these lands that brought to light the fact that ores were there.

Iron-ore lands have never been classed as mineral lands by the United States, under the decision rendered by the Attorney-General in 1850, in which he says that it has never been the policy of the Government to so regard them. Let me read the opinion; it is as follows:

[Opinions of Attorney-Generals, volume 5, page 247.]

ATTORNEY-GENERAL'S OFFICE, August 28, 1850.

SIR: I have received your letter of the 27th instant, propounding to me this question, namely: whether, "in view of the previous legislation of Congress respecting the mineral lands and the action of the General Land Office, the language 'or other valuable ores,' in the second section of the act of March 1, 1847 (Statutes at Large, 1846–'47, page 146), should be so construed as to embrace lands containing iron ore."

I answer, no. Lands containing "iron ore" merely are not to be considered as "mineral lands," but are to be disposed of according to the general law for the disposition of other public lands.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

J. J. CRITTENDEN.

Hon. Mr. MCKENNON,
Secretary of the Interior.

This has been the long unbroken policy of the Land Department from that day until this. Nothing in the world but the simple fortune of finding iron ore upon these lands has ever saved this canal company from an expenditure of $4,000,000 and a return of absolutely nothing. That is the condition of the whole thing.

As I understand, the title has been disputed on several occasions. We have two decisions rendered by the Attorney-General as to the validity of the so-called second location. We have the certificate of the governor of the State of Michigan. We have all the proceedings coming down to us in a regular formal manner, showing that they have all been taken in a legal and proper way. There stands the record. Yet the owners of the canal to-day would be very glad to have the Government take it, and I think without any compensation whatever, and keep it in repair, and relieve them from the necessity of doing it. In short, they expended $4,000,000 and got 400,000 acres of land. Ten or fifteen years afterwards they discovered that the lands contained iron ore and were valuable.

Mr. PALMER. I wish to remark to the Senator that they want $350,000 for the canal. That is the least that it can be obtained for, and at some future time I shall advise that they may be paid for it, so that the United States may get possession of it.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I am very glad indeed to learn that the Senator will assist these poor bondholders in getting $350,000 out of a piece of property which cost them $4,000,000. I think I shall be willing to join the Senator in an enterprise of that kind, because it is one of great public utility. I think the Government should have originally made the improvement, but it preferred to give 400,000 acres of land which it did not consider of any value at that time; and simply because they delved into the bowels of the earth and found that iron ore existed there I do not think it is exactly honest to undertake to take it away from them now.

Mr. President, there is an equity in this case, and it seems to me to be unbecoming on the part of the Senate to undertake to go away back of the period of time to which the general land bill which was reported by the Senator from Kansas was intended to apply, even to a time preceding the period when by the legislation of this country we were conferring great grants of land upon corporations for the purpose of building railroads throughout the country, which was done under very restrictive laws.

When we pass a law conferring on a railroad a certain number of acres of land after they have constructed so many miles of railroad we know very well what that means, but grants of land made for wagon-roads and for these canal improvements at a very early day have not been so well guarded. The people who undertook these great enterprises never doubted the honor and the justice of the Congress of the United States in this matter, and I hope they will not have occasion to doubt its justice or its honor now.

If I understand the question aright there is no way in which the interests of these people can be absolutely protected except by the amendment which has been offered by the Senator from Massachusetts. Therefore I intend by my vote to support the amendment which he has offered.

I did intend, Mr. President, to go over the ground very fully, but as I said before, the Senator from Massachusetts has relieved me from that necessity. If you wish to take into consideration who the opponents of this amendment are they may be found by reading much that you will probably see in the RECORD to-morrow morning, which has been presented by the Senator from Massachusetts, and which I might enlarge upon, but I do not think there is any necessity for doing it.

I find in this record I hold in my hand a great number of affidavits made by people who were out in that mining country and absolutely employed in the mines at a certain daily compensation. If I were to read the names it would be found that there is scarcely an American citizen among them. It seems as though they had really imported people for the purpose of entering claims upon this land. A conspiracy had practically been formed by a law firm in the city of Washington for the purpose of establishing some claim to the land in which they were to be a party and receive a part of the benefit, provided they could secure the necessary legislation by Congress to make this possible.

I hold in my hand a book containing some twenty or thirty affidavits by the very parties who had been in the conspiracy with this law firm in the city of Washington for the purpose of getting possession of this land by pre-emption claims and otherwise, and also forms of the contracts that were entered into between the law firm and these very individuals, in which the law firm was to receive a certain part of the compensation. Under the statutes of the United States, I believe, a man in making a pre-emption claim is obliged to make oath to the fact that he acts for himself and himself alone, but here in this case it seems that there were to be two or three claimants. The agent of the law firm was to have a quarter interest. It was secured to him by contract. The law firm was to have another quarter interest. But I need not go over the ground again—the Senator from Massachusetts has covered it fully and shown conclusively that the only opposition to this claim of the canal company is made in the interest of those who are attempting to steal it. They confess that to be successful implies perjury, but what of that if they only get the land?

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] appears fair enough upon its face, and if there were no objections to the manner in which the lands for the canal company had been selected and no objections to the manner in which homesteads and other entries had been made and the lands had been entered at private entry, I think it would be a proper and fair thing to be done. I still think it would be better to confirm these titles and close the books and leave no occasion for further controversy in regard to these lands. It is not true, as has been said by some Senators upon this floor, that if this grant is forfeited these people will be left with rights which they can enforce against the General Government.

A grant of lands was made in 1856 to the State of Michigan to construct a road from Marquette to the Wisconsin State line and from Ontonagon to the Wisconsin State line. Afterwards a grant of lands was made to a railroad company to construct a railroad southerly from Marquette, and it was provided in the act that the grant was to be in lieu of the grant from Marquette to the State line. The Legislature of Michigan authorized the governor to execute a deed of release for the lands from Marquette to the Wisconsin State line, and that deed was made with authority.

It was claimed on behalf of the Government by the Secretary of the Interior that the grant from Ontonagon to the Wisconsin State line should be included also, and the board of control of the State of Michigan directed the governor in 1870 to execute a deed of release to the General Government for the grant from Ontonagon to the Wisconsin State line, which he did. Thereupon the General Government proceeded to dispose of the lands from Ontonagon to the Wisconsin State line which were embraced in the governor's deed.

Probably the deed of release was made upon the theory that the ten years within which the road should have been completed having elapsed the grant was forfeited any way and was already the property of the United States.

The General Government proceeded to dispose of those lands. They were sold at private entry and at cash entry, referred to by the Senator from Arkansas, at a dollar and a quarter an acre, although they had not been reoffered for sale. They were disposed of to homestead and pre-emption claimants.

The State of Michigan by its agent—and I think it is true also that he was an officer of the canal company, but he acted in the double capacity—the State of Michigan by its agent made a selection for the canal company of 15,000 acres of land embraced in the grant from Ontonagon to the Wisconsin State line.

This bill does not affect 400,000 acres. This bill has nothing in the world to do with the rest of that grant selected for the canal. It only has to do with the 15,000 acres that are embraced in the grant from Ontonagon to the State line.

Now, then, comes the Senator from Arkansas and says that the canal never was completed properly, and was a fraud; that the lands were not authorized by the act to be selected where they were, and that they should have been selected next to the canal.

If the selections were fraudulent, I suppose that the action of the State and the action of the Secretary of the Interior would close that question up; but I do not wish, myself, to cut the Government off upon that question. I do not wish to be put in the attitude of seeking to confirm what was claimed to be a fraudulent entry. Then the Senator from Massachusetts shows that some of these homestead entrymen, who were bound to consummate and perfect the title, made a contract for disposing of the land entered previously with a man who is in the gallery looking down upon this discussion, and agreed that they would give him a portion of the land if they should enter it, and that they went upon these canal lands hoping that the Government would forfeit them and they could take them away from the canal company.

Now, I propose an amendment which, I think, every Senator will say is a fair proposition. I propose to treat the lands which were embraced within the governor's deed from Ontonagon to the Wisconsin State line precisely as if the governor's deed had been made with full authority from the State Legislature, and to say that those lands shall be forfeited, and shall be deemed to have been the property of the General Government from the date of that deed, and leave the entries for the canal, the homestead entrymen, and the purchasers at private sale, all to deal with the Government upon appeals of their case as against the Government upon the supposition that these were public lands at the time they made their entries. It confirms no one's title. It simply avoids forfeiting men's titles over their heads, and restoring the lands to the General Government and cutting off all previous titles, which our forfeiture bill would do if it were not for the amendment.

I therefore move to strike out of the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts all after the word "that" and to insert what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chief Clerk will read the proposed amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Oregon moves to strike out and insert, so as to read:

That that portion of the grant made by the State of Michigan to aid in the construction of a railroad from Ontonagon to the Wisconsin State line by an act of Congress entitled "An act making a grant of alternate sections of the public lands to the State of Michigan to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said State, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1856, forfeited by the first section of this act as between all adverse claims to the same under the laws of the United States, and as against the United States and the State of Michigan, shall be deemed and held to have been restored to and to have become a part of the public domain at the date of the execution of the deed of release of said lands to the United States by the governor of said State, to wit, August 14, 1870.

Mr. BERRY. I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon if that would not have the effect to confirm to the canal company the 15,000 acres of land to which the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts alludes?

Mr. DOLPH. No, sir.

Mr. BERRY. I ask the Senator from Oregon if the bill itself does not forfeit that land without his amendment?

Mr. DOLPH. The bill itself would forfeit all the lands within the grant adjacent to the uncompleted road.

Mr. BERRY. Would not that include the 15,000 acres?

Mr. DOLPH. It would include not only the 15,000 acres, but lands that have been sold as homestead lands and entered at private entry.

Mr. BERRY. Then I ask the Senator from Oregon, if it does not have the effect to confirm those lands to the canal company, why not allow those 15,000 acres to be forfeited as other lands opposite the uncompleted portion of the railroads throughout the country, and let the rights of the parties be determined in the courts, without our attempting to determine them by legislation?

Mr. DOLPH. I have been endeavoring to make the Senator understand that. I think it is pretty well understood. The governor of the State of Michigan, acting under authority of the board of control, executed a deed of release of these lands to the General Government on the 14th of August, 1870. The State of Michigan understood that that restored them to the public domain. The United States understood that they were then a part of the public domain.

The General Government proceeded to deal with them as if they were a part of the public domain. The State of Michigan selected a portion of them as if they were a part of the public domain; and now I say as between the General Government and the State of Michigan and these parties, no harm can be done by making by law what the parties thought they were doing by a deed. I say it does not confirm any title. It makes those lands a part of the public domain and leaves the rights of parties as to those lands the same as if this act had been passed on the 14th of August, 1870, at the date of the deed.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator, but I should like to ask him a question.

Mr. DOLPH. There is no confirmation, but, as I said before, it leaves their titles to stand as if these had been public lands.

If these lands have been wrongfully selected and have been patented the Secretary of the Interior can to-morrow direct the Attorney-General to institute a suit to set aside the patents. If they have not been patented he can withhold the patents, on the ground, first, that they were mineral lands, if he chooses to do so, or that the canal company was not entitled to select lands so far away from the canal, or that the canal company has not earned them by the completion of the canal, or for any other reason. If they have been improperly patented a suit can be brought to set aside that patent.

It is just the same way in regard to entries by homestead entrymen. If they have gone there by fraud and have sworn falsely that they had never contracted with Mr. Redington to deed a portion of these lands when they obtained title, their titles can be set aside, or their patents need not be issued to them.

The amendment leaves them to adjust their title with the General Government upon the theory that this was public land, and therefore ought to be treated as such.

Mr. PALMER. Will the Senator from Oregon permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BLAIR. I desire to ask the Senator from Oregon a question.

Mr. DOLPH. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not wish to make a speech, but to call the attention of the Senator from Oregon to an aspect of his amendment which occurs to me, whether, if effective at all, it is not necessarily retroactive, and whether it can be of any effect if it be retroactive. As I understand it, the deed referred to is treated as of no consequence because the governor made the deed without authority from the Legislature, and as I understand the fact, the Legislature never has ratified that deed or in any way made it valid by legislation.

Mr. DOLPH. Probably not. On the contrary, in 1881, the State undertook to grant these same lands to another railroad company.

Mr. BLAIR. Precisely; so that if the governor's deed was ever invalid for lack of ratification or prior authority of the Legislature, it still remains so; and that being the case, I wish to ask the Senator if he thinks it is possible, first, for Congress to pass an act of forfeiture, which in any case would take effect earlier than the date of its passage, and, second, whether Congress in this case can possibly have any power to pass an act of forfeiture which is valid if that deed requires the ratification of the Michigan Legislature?

Mr. DOLPH. I have no doubt about that. If the deed of the governor to the General Government was invalid, the lands, so far as they have not been earned, are subject to the disposal of Congress. Congress has power to pass the bill as it came from the committee, and to forfeit these lands without taking any notice of what has been done by the General Government and by the State of Michigan from the execution of that deed to the present time; or it has ample power to say, when the Government comes to adjust titles of all the persons who have gone on these lands since the date of that deed and who dealt with the General Government in regard to them, that their titles shall be dealt with upon the theory that the lands were public lands at the time the transactions were had. That leaves the rights of every person to be determined by the courts the same as if the lands had been public lands at the time they entered upon them or at the time they were selected.

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator yield to me now for a question?

Mr. PALMER. Will the Senator from Oregon allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DOLPH. Yes, sir.

Mr. PALMER. I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon what the effect of his amendment would be on the rights of a homesteader who entered upon lands in that tract and cultivated them for from five to fifteen years, which lands had been purchased by a cash entryman in contravention of law.

Mr. DOLPH. The homesteader would have the advantage, because the question of the right to enter these lands at private entry is a different question from the right to select them by the canal company and from the rights of homestead and pre-emption entry. The private entries were probably invalid for two reasons: first, because the governor's deed was not sufficient to transfer the title to the General Government, and therefore they were the property of the State of Michigan or the railroad company, and could not be entered. But they were invalid for another reason; that is, supposing the present rulings of the Department of the Interior to be correct law. They hold that where lands have been once offered at public sale, and were, before a grant to a railroad company, subject to private entry, and then are granted to a railroad company, and afterwards the grant is forfeited and the lands restored to the public domain, they are not subject to private entry again until they have been again offered at public sale. The trouble is that under some of these private entries up there, by some arrangement, large tracts of land were entered at a dollar and a quarter an acre, the minimum price, under the theory that the moment, on the ground of forfeiture, the lands were restored they could be again entered at private entry.

I do not think my amendment would infuse any validity into those private entries, and they are the least meritorious of all these claims. Therefore I think the homestead entryman and the pre-emption entryman would hold against the cash entryman, because the cash entry was made in violation of the law and the ruling of the Department, which holds that notwithstanding the grant had been surrendered to the General Government the lands were not subject to private entry, not having been reoffered at public sale.

Mr. PALMER. If the cash entryman had entered lands in 1871, a year after the time limited when these should be considered as lands of the United States open to private entry, and a homesteader had made his application and taken possession in 1872, would not the cash entryman under the amendment have the right to the land?

Mr. DOLPH. No; the amendment does not cover the question as to whether the lands were subject to private entry, supposing them to have been public lands. It leaves that for some future legislation. If Congress in some other bill proposes to confirm those titles, it can do it, but this does not do it. It simply says that where lands have been restored to the public domain they shall not be subject to private entry because they had not been again offered at public sale. That, as I said before, is on the supposition that the rulings of the Department upon that subject are correct, and those are the uniform rulings. Therefore I say to the Senator that the subsequent homestead claimant would have the right to the lands, because the first purchase would be void; but I understand that in most of those cases the patents are out, and before a patent can be issued to a homestead entryman the Government will have to take some step to set aside the patents which have been issued to cash entrymen. But upon the general question my amendment would give the homestead and pre-emption entryman an advantage over the cash entryman.

Mr. DAWES obtained the floor.

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to me for just one moment? I asked the Senator from Oregon to yield on two occasions, and he declined to do so.

Mr. DOLPH. I did not. I intended to yield, but the Senator from Michigan had made an unsuccessful attempt to get me to yield before I yielded to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR]. I yielded to the Senator from New Hampshire first, and then did not observe that the Senator from Arkansas had asked me to yield.

Mr. BERRY. I wished to ask the Senator if his amendment would have the effect to give either those who claim under the canal company or the canal company, the cash entryman, an advantage over the homestead and pre-emption settlers? The general bill forfeits the lands anyhow, and I desired to ask what necessity there was for this amendment unless it changes the status and gives some one an advantage that he does not now have? I wished to ask why there is any necessity for the adoption of the amendment, because if the general bill passes and the forfeiture takes place each of the parties is left precisely in a situation to assert his claim, and those who have the right will prevail in court. Then, if you go back and date this forfeiture from the time of the conveyance from the governor of Michigan, if it does not give some one an advantage I desired to know from the Senator from Oregon what the necessity was for placing it on the bill?

Mr. DAWES. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Arkansas and the Senate to the argument which the Senator has made against the equity and justice of the claim of those who now hold under the canal company. Suppose all the Senator said about the manner in which this corporation had conducted itself in the selection of the land to be true. So far as the proceedings of that corporation are concerned, I did call his attention to one feature of it, and that is that those were the acts of another corporation, and not of the corporation which got its title through a court, and conveyed whatever title it had to these purchasers for a valuable consideration in other States. That seemed to be to me one answer of that argument of the Senator from Arkansas.

Another answer to the Senator's argument is that all that proceeding applied to the first 200,000 acres. The 15,000 acres about which we are discussing now lie in the second 200,000 acres that were selected afterwards and are not exposed to the allegation which the Senator makes, whether true or not. The only objection to the selection of the 15,000 acres on the score of legality that I have heard is that they were not contiguous to the canal.

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. DAWES. Yes, sir.

Mr. BERRY. One other objection would be that the lands had prior to that time been granted to a railroad and they were included in the Ontonagon grant.

Mr. DAWES. I understand that. I am coming to that.

Mr. BERRY. Therefore the selection was illegal for that reason.

Mr. DAWES. I am speaking of the illegality which grows out of the corporation's conduct, and that does not apply to the 15,000 acres, because the 15,000 acres lay in the last 200,000 acres which were granted, and they were granted without any specific requirement that they should be adjacent to the canal.

Now the Senator says he thinks they ought to have been adjacent, and the report of the majority of the committee of the House from which he read says they are inclined to the opinion that they ought to have been adjacent. Attorney-General Crittenden decided that iron ore lands were not included within the term "mineral lands," and the subsequent opinion of Attorney-General Williams was that the law did not require the lands to be selected adjacent to the canal, so that that objection, if the Attorney-General is correct, is removed.

The Senator says it was an illegal selection, because the lands had been previously granted to a railroad company. That is the defect in the title which has come to bona fide purchasers, which we are seeking to have confirmed. The lands were granted to a railroad company, and the Supreme Court has decided that, though the railroad never earned them, yet the title remained in the railroad company until they were declared forfeited. But that is a decision of the Supreme Court since this transaction, and nobody went upon that idea, but on the contrary idea, that if the railroad company did not earn the lands they were not theirs, and the governor of the State went on that idea and supposed that they had become lands open to selection, and when he was authorized to select for the canal he went on and selected them. So I think that answers the argument of the Senator as to the illegality of the proceeding up to that time touching the 15,000 acres, leaving what he says about the wrong conduct of the president of the old company as to the 200,000 acres, true or false, as the case may be.

As to the effect of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon, I understand it to be this: It declares that these were public lands when the governor of Michigan made the deed which is supposed to have been made without authority. Then it leaves the legality or illegality of all subsequent transactions to be determined by the courts. If the transactions of the canal company from that date having selections made by the governor of Michigan upon lands which all supposed then he had a right to make, and which it turns out he had not a right to make, this amendment declares that they were open so that he could make that selection.

If from that day all things were legal on the part of the canal company, if the land was properly selected, if the canal was properly constructed and there were no frauds, then those who hold under the canal company would have a perfect chain of title. If, on the other hand, they were fraudulent or defective in title, then they would lose. Then would come the question whether the men who claim to be settlers could hold the land, and that would depend upon precisely the same test, whether the several steps taken by them were with clean hands and in conformity to law. If they were, those antecedent steps taken by the canal company on the selection of the governor failing and they establishing that they had honestly conformed to the law, they would hold it. So it leaves between the canal company and those who claim to be settlers the question for the court to determine, which of them was acting in conformity with law. If it is the elder title of the canal company, that would prevail; if it is the subsequent title of the man claiming to be a homesteader and he has conformed to the law, he would prevail. That I understand to be the meaning.

The Senator from Arkansas, among other things, says that the company never completed the canal, they never made any harbor, they never made any breakwater, and the Senator relies for that statement upon a report made twelve or fourteen years after in the House of Representatives, signed by a portion of the committee there. The law required that, in order to entitle them to these lands, they should obtain the certificate of the governor of Michigan that they had complied with the law, and I want to read that certificate.

Now, therefore, I, John J. Bagley—

This was in 1875. We are undertaking to review thirteen years afterwards the condition of things about which John J. Bagley, governor of Michigan, made this certificate.

Now, therefore, I, John J. Bagley, governor of the State of Michigan, do hereby determine—

As the statute required that he should—that said canal and harbor have been constructed by said company as required by said act of Congress, and in conformity with the plans and specifications therefor, and do accordingly hereby certify the same to said company.

My colleague is a better lawyer than I am, and I speak with the more confidence when he says that the law makes that conclusive on everybody. I have no doubt of it, and I should like to inquire, when that goes as a part of the title into the hands of honest purchasers for a valuable consideration, who can go back of it? But whether that can be done or not, this is twelve or thirteen years after that statement. We are legislating upon a conclusion come to by a portion of this committee, which at best says "we are only inclined to this opinion."

Mr. BERRY. I wish to ask the Senator from Massachusetts, if he is correct that the certificate of the governor is conclusive in point of law and would be so held in a court of justice, whether he says we can not go behind it to show that there was fraud in the selection of these lands? If that be admitted to be true, I ask the Senator, if these parties from some other cause have failed to get a legal title and come here and ask equity, ask the Congress of the United States to grant them a simple equity, being afraid to rely on their legal title—I ask him if that would not be admitted here or anywhere else as proof to show that there was fraud in the original transaction, and that they had no equity that Congress was bound to respect?

Mr. DAWES. My answer is this: If the title to the land at the time we are discussing it was held by a party to a fraudulent certificate, all that would be true. If by fraud on the part of the party now holding the land he had obtained such a certificate, that would be true; but that certificate is as much a part of the chain of title as a formal deed of a prior grantor in the hands of these purchasers, who are homesteaders, though not technically homesteaders under the law, but residents upon the land, cultivators of the farms purchased of this company on this record title.

Mr. BERRY. I was going to ask one other question. The Senator says that my proposition is correct, but he claims that this is an exception to it. I ask him as a lawyer if Congress granted certain specific lands, a specific number of acres of land nearest the canal, and other lands were notoriously selected, would not the purchasers be held to have notice of that act of Congress, and could they come in and claim to be innocent purchasers?

Mr. DAWES. That is assuming, in the Senator's opinion, that they should have been so selected, although not required by statute.

Mr. BERRY. By the first act they were absolutely required to make the selections contiguous to the canal.

Mr. DAWES. But these 15,000 acres we are discussing about were not part of the first selection.

Mr. BERRY. They were part of the second selection.

Mr. DAWES. I know, but the act providing for the second selection was silent as to the locality of the land.

Mr. BERRY. But these lands were not subject to selection, because they had been, prior to that time, granted to another corporation, and hence they were not subject, under the law, to this selection.

One other question. The Senator, as I understood him, said that if the amendment of the Senator from Oregon should be adopted all these rights would be determined. I assert, and have asserted before, that the bill as it came from the committee simply forfeits this land to the Government of the United States, and does not undertake to affect the rights of any party as they now stand, and if the party of whom he speaks, the canal company, has superior rights, why not leave those rights to the courts of the country?

Why ask the Congress of the United States to intervene in a disputed matter of this kind, where homesteaders and pre-emption men are concerned? I say that if any person is entitled to the protection of Congress over and above others it is the man who settled there as a homesteader, the man who has taken pre-emption and made his home and raised his family on that land, rather than the canal company. Why not let them take their chances in the courts of the country instead of seeking to give them an advantage through an act of Congress?

Mr. DAWES. The difference between the Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from Oregon is this: The Senator from Arkansas proposes to forfeit the lands as of to-day to the United States with these homestead claimants upon the land, and the Senator from Oregon proposes to forfeit them as of the day when they were selected by the governor of Michigan, supposing that the company had a title. The company sold the lands to obtain funds to build the canal, and they are in the hands of innocent bona fide holders who are holding them now. That is the difference between the two.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask the Senator to give way for a moment.

Mr. PLUMB. Before the motion is put I wish to have it understood that the bill shall come up to-morrow at the conclusion of the morning business.

Mr. MANDERSON. I hope the motion to adjourn will be withheld for a moment.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask unanimous consent that the bill may come up at the conclusion of the morning business to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the consideration of the pending bill, Senate bill 1430, may be resumed to-morrow at the conclusion of the formal morning business. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. MANDERSON. Expecting that I may be called away from the Senate to-morrow or perhaps on Friday, and may not be here when certain amendments that I desire to propose to this bill will be in order, I wish to submit them, and before doing so to state the reason why, in my opinion, the bill should be thus amended.

This bill, unfortunately, is encumbered by a good deal of matter that seems to me to be extraneous to it, and the Senate for several days appears to have resolved itself into a sort of subcommittee upon the much-vexed question as to what is right with reference to the Michigan canal grant.

I think it unfortunate that this great diversity of opinion should exist as to the law and the facts, and that the proper measure of relief should not have been considered by the Committee on Public Lands separate and apart from this bill.

This bill in several of its sections, those reported from the committee and those which have been already adopted by the Committee of the Whole, proposes that, where there is a loss of title by a purchaser by reason of the failure of the grant to the railroad company, there shall be recovery against the United States to a certain degree, or rather that the purchaser may buy of the United States the land, the title to which has been forfeited, at the rate of $2.50 per acre.

I greatly fear that in the construction of this act the courts may hold that that would be action operating for the benefit of the grantor as well as the grantee, and that it might be construed that the purchaser whose title had failed would not have his common-law remedy against the railroad grantor for the purchase-price that he had paid and interest from the date of the payment; and, therefore, when it shall be in order, I hope that this amendment may be adopted to the bill:

Nothing in this act contained shall be construed as in any manner affecting any cause of action existing in favor of any purchaser against his grantor for breach of any covenant of title.

I ask that that may be printed and that at the proper time it may be considered.

Mr. HOAR. With my friend's permission, I ask that my amendment may also be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. All the amendments proposed will be printed.

Mr. MANDERSON. On the 3d day of March, 1887, there was approved an act entitled "An act to provide for the adjustment of land grants made by Congress to aid in the construction of railroads and for the forfeiture of unearned lands, and for other purposes." This act had most valuable provisions designed for the protection of those who had purchased of the land-grant railroad companies where title had failed; and I fear also that if this bill shall become a law, particularly with the amendments proposed by the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL], it will operate to a certain extent as a repeal of that act of March 3, 1887. I do not think that would be the desire of the Senate, and I therefore propose this further amendment:

Nothing in this act contained shall be construed as limiting the rights granted purchasers or settlers by the act approved March 3, 1887, entitled "An act to provide for the adjustment of land grants made by Congress to aid in the construction of railroads, and for the forfeiture of unearned lands, and for other purposes," or as repealing, altering, or amending said act.

Mr. CALL. The Senator will allow me a word?

Mr. MANDERSON. Certainly.

Mr. CALL. My amendment is only intended to be operative as to the grants in the State of Florida, and is intended altogether for the protection of actual settlers and homesteaders there.

Mr. MANDERSON. It may be that I have misconceived the operation of the proposed amendment of the Senator from Florida. I knew that there was one amendment which was particularly applicable to the State he represents in part, but it seems to me there was also a general amendment proposed by him that might have the effect I have suggested.

I will say, Mr. President, that I have submitted both these amendments to the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, and he thinks with me that they are desirable amendments to this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendments will be printed.

LIGHT-HOUSE AT GOOSE ROCKS, MAINE.

Mr. FRYE. I have an especial reason for asking that the pending bill may be informally laid aside, and that the Senate consider Order of Business 995, Senate bill 2506.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent that the pending business be informally laid aside to enable him to move the consideration of Senate bill 2506.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 2506) for the establishment of a light-house, fog-signal, and day-beacon in the vicinity of Goose Rocks, Fox Island Thoroughfare, Maine, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, which was, at the end of the bill, to insert:

And said $35,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary for said purposes, is hereby appropriated out of moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

So as to read:

Be it enacted, etc., That there be established at or near Goose Rocks, at the entrance to Fox Island Thoroughfare, on the coast of Maine, a light-house and fog-signal, and that there be established at or near Channel Rock, in the vicinity of Goose Rocks, a day-beacon, the cost of which shall not exceed the sum of $35,000, including the cost of the sites, and said $35,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary for said purposes, is hereby appropriated out of moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONFERENCE WITH SOUTH AMERICAN COUNTRIES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. FRYE, Mr. DOLPH, and Mr. BROWN conferees on the part of the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. 1473) authorizing the President of the United States to arrange a conference between the United States of America and the Republics of Mexico, Central and South America, Hayti, San Domingo, and the Empire of Brazil.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore designated Mr. HOAR, and Mr. JONES of Arkansas, to attend the annual examination of cadets at the United States Military Academy.

VISITORS TO NAVAL ACADEMY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. PADDOCK and Mr. WALTHALL to attend the annual examination at the Naval Academy.

UNDERGROUND TELEGRAPH AND TELEPHONE WIRES.

Mr. VEST. I move that a letter from the Secretary of War be printed, transmitted to the Senate April 16, 1888, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, being a report of the officer in charge of the public buildings and grounds in the District of Columbia, relative to underground telegraph and telephone wires. By some inadvertence the motion to print was not made. In the motion I desire not to include the maps, but simply the report and accompanying documents.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order to print will be made, excluding the maps.

LOSSES BY POSTMASTERS.

Mr. MITCHELL submitted the following report:

"SEC. 2. That it is hereby made the duty of the Postmaster-General to report his action herein to Congress annually, with his reasons therefor in each particular case."

And the Senate agree to the same.

The Senator from Michigan moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 2 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, April 26, 1888, at 12 o'clock m.

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment to the title of the bill; and agree to the same.

S. W. T. LANHAM,
JAMES H. BLOUNT,
W. G. LAIDLAW,
Managers on the part of the House.

JOHN H. MITCHELL,
PHILETUS SAWYER,
JOHN H. REAGAN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The accompanying statement of the House conferees is as follows:

The managers on the part of the House submit the following statement:

This was a bill for the relief of postmaster for the loss of certain postal funds. The Senate amended the bill so as to change it into an amendment of the act of March 17, 1882, entitled "An act authorizing the Postmaster-General to adjust certain claims of postmasters for loss by burglary, fire, or other unavoidable casualty."

Under this act no provision is made for the loss of "postal funds." The bill as now agreed upon includes postal funds and allows the Postmaster-General to credit postmasters with the amount of money-order or postal funds lost after the arrival thereof at the depository office and before the postmaster at such depository office has become responsible therefor.

Another change made in the existing law by the bill is that claims for postal funds may be received, considered, and allowed, if presented within six months after passage of the bill, in cases where the postmaster had, at or about the time of the loss, made report thereof to the Post-Office Department or to an inspector or special agent of the Department, and that no claim for losses which may hereafter accrue shall be allowed unless presented within six months from the time the loss occurred.

The bill in the shape now submitted meets the approval of the Postmaster-General, to whom the matter was submitted before the conference upon the bill.

Respectfully, etc.,

S. W. T. LANHAM,
JAMES H. BLOUNT,
W. G. LAIDLAW,
Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. HOLMAN. This is a very short bill, and I hope it will be now read as proposed to be amended.

Mr. LANHAM. The conference report, which has been read, includes the text of the bill exactly as agreed upon by the conference committee. It is substantially the draught of a bill submitted by the Postmaster-General, and meets his approval. The measure is designed to cover an omission in the existing statutes with reference to postal funds, and also to increase the length of time within which claims of this character may be presented from three months to six months. The statement of the managers on the part of the House, which fully explains the scope and purpose of the bill as now agreed upon, has just been read.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is it understood that the measure now recommended is substantially the bill as amended by the Senate?

Mr. LANHAM. It is the bill as amended by the Senate, with some modifications suggested by the Postmaster-General.

The report of the conference committee was agreed to.

Mr. LANHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MRS. JULIET G. HOWE.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. CHIPMAN, Mr. FRENCH, and Mr. MORRILL as conferees on the part of the House upon the bill (S. 300) granting a pension to Mrs. Juliet G. Howe.

R. 8837) for the erection of a public building at Mount Vernon, Ill.; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

TARIFF.

Mr. MILLS. I ask unanimous consent that the morning hour for the presentation of reports be dispensed with, and that gentlemen having reports may file them at the Clerk's desk, and have them referred and entered on the Journal as though presented under the regular call.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. MILLS. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of continuing the consideration of the tariff bill. Pending that motion, I ask unanimous consent that the House take a recess to-day from 5 o'clock till 8 o'clock p. m., the evening session to be devoted exclusively to debate on the tariff bill.

Mr. DUNHAM. I object.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then I ask unanimous consent that there may be a recess from 5 o'clock till 8 o'clock to-day, the evening session to be devoted to the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on Territories.

Mr. KEAN. I object.

The motion of Mr. MILLS, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to resume the consideration of the tariff bill, was then agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill the title of which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the revenue.

Mr. BYNUM. Mr. Chairman, the bill under discussion demands, and will no doubt receive, that careful and intelligent consideration which the importance of the subject requires. It affects the interests and the welfare of all classes, industries, and sections. The power to levy and collect revenues is primary to the maintenance and preservation of governments, and when laid with an even hand and restricted within the bounds of just and economical expenditure has never been questioned; but when it has been exercised with a discriminating hand and to such an extent that more was exacted than could be properly used, murmurs and discontent have arisen. No people, in the enjoyment of full political power, will long submit to a system of taxation which impoverishes one class or industry for the enrichment of another.

By the Constitution power has been conferred upon the Federal Government to levy and collect revenues to pay the debts and to provide for the common defense and general welfare. On the 1st day of next July our present system and rate of taxation will have yielded a sum over and above these requisites of nearly $140,000,000. Adhering to that construction of the Constitution which has always been cardinal with the Democratic party and from which no people in the enjoyment of free government can safely depart, I believe that this excessive taxation is not only detrimental to our welfare, but that no warrant for its maintenance anywhere exists, and that it is our duty to bring it within certain limitations of constitutional power. The withdrawal of this large sum of money from the channels of trade for any period of time will excite the apprehensions of the people and result in a contraction of values and of credits that will swallow up in bankruptcy our most active and energetic men. To apologize for this condition of affairs is a mockery, to defend it is a crime. We can not longer escape the responsibility which rests upon us without arousing the indignation of an oppressed people.

The time has passed when a majority of this House can refuse to consider a bill for the reduction of taxes. The time has passed when the enacting clause of a measure for the reduction of revenues can be stricken out. The time has come when this question must be squarely met and an honest effort made to reform the tariff.

I am free to confess that the bill presented does not meet my unqualified approval. I believe that duties upon imports should be levied and collected at all times to meet the current ordinary expenses of the Government, and that extraordinary expenses should be met by the collection of internal revenues so far as can be reasonably done. Holding these views, if left untrammeled, I would retain our present internal system of taxation, or so much thereof as might be necessary, until the last obligation growing out of the late war was paid. Mindful, however, of the diversified interests of this great country, of its varied climate, its discriminating soil, and its multifarious industries, I am willing to meet the representatives of every section in a spirit of compromise and join in the construction and passage of a measure which concedes something to the sentiments of every class and to the productions of every locality.

That the present law fixing duties upon imports is onerous; that it was framed by partial hands, in the spirit of favoritism and selfishness, there is abundant proof. We are, however, met with the statement that it encourages American industries, protects the wages of American labor, and furnishes a home market for the farmer's products; that a modification of it will result in the destruction of our industries, cause a reduction of wages, and impair the farmer's market.

I shall pass the question of favoritism, ignore the fact that one industry, under the present law, is compelled to pay tribute to another, and accept the issue as tendered by the opponents of this or any measure for the reduction of duties upon imports.

I am willing to answer to that great body of intelligent wage-workers that I have the honor to represent, as to whether I have been true to their interests when I stood upon this floor pleading for cheaper materials for them to work up and a larger market in which to sell their products. I am willing to answer to the manufacturers of fifty millions of products and to abide by their judgment as to whether I have been faithful to their interests in advocating the passage of a measure which will open to them the markets of South America and Australasia. I am willing to answer to fifteen thousand farmers as to whether I have been true to their interests in demanding a reduction of taxes upon everything they consume.

Will a reduction of duties necessarily cause a reduction of wages? No greater fallacy was ever asserted. Labor does not receive all or any great portion of the protection given by the present law. The protection upon cotton goods runs from 42.30 per cent. to 73.31 per cent., and yet the labor cost in these manufactures only runs from 12.57 per cent. to 37 per cent. The protection on woolen goods runs from 52.07 per cent. to 89.94 per cent., and yet the labor cost in these manufactures only runs from 16.36 per cent. to 31.25 per cent.

Wages neither rise above nor fall below the standard. The standard is not fixed by the manufacturers in proportion to the rate of duties imposed, but is fixed by the prices paid in all the avocations and by the opportunities in independent pursuits. The only effect of a duty upon imports, so far as wages are involved, is that it enables the manufacturer to pay the standard of wages already existing.

A duty that adds to the cost of an article more than a compensation for the difference in the cost of labor enables the manufacturer to increase the price above that limit, which the laborer in return as a consumer is compelled to pay, and thus he is robbed of the protection he is said to have received while making it. Wages have always been higher in this country than in the thickly-settled and over-populated countries of Europe. Our boundless territory and free institutions afford such opportunities as to develop the greatest energy, the highest skill and intelligence, and wherever these are found labor is more valuable, and therefore commands higher wages. It has been stated, and not contradicted, that in 1882 each laborer in manufacturing industries in the United States produced $1,523 worth of products, while for the same year each laborer in Great Britain produced only $778 worth. These figures prove that American labor is equally as cheap as British labor at double the wages. American manufacturers can pay much higher wages than their European competitors and still have cheaper labor.

The tendency of wages since 1860, it is true, has been upward, but not as a result of protection; because the same increase has taken place in Great Britain under free trade. France has a "protective" tariff, and yet wages are lower in France than in England. Germany has still higher "protection," and yet wages in Germany are lower than in France, and far below what they are in England.

What is labor? Why is it that capitalists construct mills, purchase materials, and employ laborers to work the same up? It is because by combining the materials and the labor he produces something for which there is a market and which he can sell at a profit. When he sells the product he sells the materials and the labor that he has purchased and sells both at a profit. By combining the materials and labor he has a product for which there is a demand. If there is no demand for his product, if the market has been supplied, he at once closes his factory, stops the purchase of materials, and discharges his employés. Labor is as much a commodity, selling in the market, as the materials to be worked up. If there is a great demand for the product, there is a great demand for the materials and for the labor necessary to manufacture it. If the price of materials goes up, wages go up. If labor is but a commodity selling in the market, its price is regulated solely by supply and demand. If the demand is great, wages will go up; if it is small, wages will go down. It requires no argument to convince laboring men that in a community where a large number are out of work and seeking employment that wages will be low and work hard to obtain. Competition will force them down to the lowest standard of living in spite of organization. But when there is work for all, when two employers are after one laborer instead of two laborers being after one employer, wages will be high.

It will not be gainsaid that for some years there has been great competition between our wage-workers. It was this competition that forced them to organize to protect their interests and preserve their independence. Why is it that there is so much unrest amongst the laboring classes? Why have they been compelled to organize unions, brotherhoods, and assemblies?

The advocates of protection tell us that the country has grown rich under this system. True it has grown rich; but where is the wealth? In the hands of the few, while poverty abides in the homes of the many. Why is it that the great masses of the people have no share in the wealth that has been wrought by their hands? Of what benefit is it to us, as a nation, to pour millions into the coffers of the few when it only increases their power for greater extortions from the many? These are questions that demand our consideration.

It is true that we have made great progress during the last quarter of a century. We have invented more labor-saving machinery and know better how to use it than any nation in the world. Mr. Wright, the Commissioner of Labor, in his first annual report, informs us that in the manufacture of agricultural implements machinery has displaced fully 50 per cent. of muscular labor. In the manufacture of small-arms one man now accomplishes as much, in turning and fitting stock, as fifty formerly did. In the manufacture of boots and shoes one man can now perform as much work by the use of machinery as seven formerly did without it. In the manufacture of carriages and wagons, of paper, of saws, of tobacco, and, substantially, of everything, the same proportion of muscular labor has been displaced by the invention and use of machinery. It is claimed that one man now accomplishes as much work in manufactures with the aid of machinery as seven formerly did without it. The invention of machinery was not the result of a high tariff, but of the protection afforded by our patent laws.

While we have been increasing our productive capacity by the invention of machinery we have increased the number of our laborers over 30 per cent. by immigration. What, then, is our condition to-day? Upon one hand we have invented labor-saving machinery and upon the other we have been receiving large acquisitions of laborers from foreign countries until to-day we can produce more than we can consume. My object in calling attention to the inventions of machinery and the large immigration is not to find fault with either. I am in favor of stimulating the genius of our people; I am in favor of receiving the honest, able-bodied immigrant who comes here to find shelter from the tyrannies and oppressions of his native land. My purpose in calling attention to them is to establish a fact upon which to construct, if I am able, a logical argument.

While we have by these methods increased the number and capacity of our laborers until they are able to produce, in many lines, more than we can consume, we have been constructing a wall around our coast which, year by year, month by month, and day by day, restricted more closely their market within our own boundaries.

As our surplus increased our market has decreased. We have had for some years what we have denominated overproduction, a surplus of labor.

We are told, however, that it is not so much from overproduction as from underconsumption from which we are suffering. This is partially true. Our laboring classes do not consume as much as they should, but what is the reason? An overproduction inevitably results in under-consumption. Our laboring classes are not only our great body of producers, but are also our great body of consumers. Give to a laboring man a dollar a day and he supports his family and lives upon it; how he does it is difficult for us to say, but he has to; it is all he has. Give him $2 a day and he lives just twice as well; he lives in a more comfortable house, his table is supplied with a greater variety of food, his children go to school and his wife to church better clothed, but he saves nothing. Few wage-workers are able to lay up anything; they do well to keep even. With an enlarged production and a restricted market what takes place. Our manufactories run nine, ten, or eleven months, as the case may be, upon an average, when a sufficient supply is produced for a whole year, when the doors are closed and the operatives are discharged to await the revival of the market.

The very moment the operatives are thrown out of employment then comes underconsumption. When out of work they are out of means and out of credit. Their standard of living at once falls to the very lowest point. We have all witnessed just such results time and again in this country in the last few years. With our garners filled to overflowing and our mills packed with goods we have seen laboring men and their families, for the want of work, suffering for food and shivering for clothing, and this the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] calls protecting American labor.

Mr. FUNSTON. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. BYNUM. Yes, sir.

Mr. FUNSTON. But a moment ago you placed labor upon the market as an article to be bought and sold, like pumpkins or corn. What can you expect but that it should take its chances in the market like those articles?

Mr. BYNUM. The remedy is that you must give the laborers a market in which to sell their surplus products. Give them that market and they will maintain the standard of wages the year round; but you take that market away from them, and necessarily there is no means of disposing of this surplus, and their labor becomes valueless to that extent.

Mr. FUNSTON. What is to prevent them selling that surplus now?

Mr. BYNUM. I will show you what before I get through. That is just the line of argument that I intended to pursue.

Mr. COX. They can not sell unless there is some one to buy.

Mr. BYNUM. No, they can not; and that is just what I propose to show. You have deprived them of a market, and there is no means by which they can dispose of their surplus labor after supplying the home markets. You have deprived them of foreign markets by giving their competitors great advantages in the cost of materials to be worked up.

I have witnessed just such protection as this until I have seen the officer walk into the humble home, carry the furniture out upon the street, and then compel the mother and children to abandon their shelter while he closed and fastened the doors, because the rent was unpaid. And what does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] offer to the laboring men to relieve them from their distresses and the distresses of their families? Cheap tobacco and cheaper whisky. Away with such protection. Give to American labor cheap materials to work and it will, after supplying the demand at home, load American ships with its surplus products, transport them across the seas, and fill the marts of every civilized country in the world. Give to American labor a chance; give to it equal facilities and equal opportunities, and it will take care of itself at home and abroad. [Applause.]

Mr. FARQUHAR. Before the gentleman leaves that branch of the subject I should like to ask him a question.

Mr. BYNUM. I will yield to the gentleman with pleasure.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I would like the gentleman from Indiana, since he has undertaken to deal with this branch of the subject so fully, to harmonize, if he can, his statements about the law of supply and demand with that of overproduction to which he refers, especially in respect to its influence on the rate of wages. I must confess that I am not able to do it, and I see that he has given the subject considerable care, and I know the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM] has given thought and attention to the question.

Mr. BYNUM. Mr. Chairman, if I had time to fully present all the facts bearing upon this question, which I can only partially present in my time, I should be very glad to discuss the point with the gentleman from New York. But the gentleman from New York knows that in the cities of this country, where laborers are gathered in large numbers, the price of wages has gone down until the condition of the laboring classes has become such as to produce strike after strike, in the last few years, with a view, if possible, to better their condition.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I may grant so, and that is the reason I have asked the gentleman from Indiana now to bring some harmony between the economic laws, to which he is referring, of demand and supply and this overproduction, which he says brings wages down. I wish him to show some connection between them, as he seems to be pursuing his argument in that line.

Mr. BYNUM. I can not yield for the gentleman to make a speech.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I do not propose to make a speech, but I would like to have the gentleman harmonize his statements on this point.

Mr. BYNUM. Nor can I go into the whole question of political economy as involved in this subject. I could not do it in two, three, or even four hours. I should be very glad, as I have said, to follow out this train of thought and show the gentleman its effect fully upon labor; but I propose to follow out the same line that I have been pursuing, and think I will convince the gentleman before I conclude that there is no want of harmony in my argument, and that he will find it sufficiently connected to occupy most of his time in answering. [Applause on Democratic side.]

American labor to-day is carrying upon its back burdens which the labor of no other country could stand. What elements do manufacturers compute to carry on successful production? First, the plant; second, the materials; third, the labor; and, fourth, the selling price. What does he control? The cost of plant? No! The cost of materials? No! The selling price? No! The cost of labor? Yes. He pays the market price for his plant, he must purchase materials at the market rates, and he must sell at as low a price as his competitor. If he pays more for his materials where can he get even and sell at the market price? He is compelled to take it off of labor. Labor carries the additional cost of materials and stands the reduction of prices in the market.

Mr. FARQUHAR. With the permission of the gentleman from Indiana I wish to say one thing.

Mr. BYNUM. The gentleman from New York can answer my questions in his own time. He will be entitled to have as much time as I have. I can not submit to these interruptions for a speech; I might for a question. I do not feel at liberty to trespass on the time of the gentlemen who come after me.

American labor is burdened with a duty of $6.72 on pig iron, and a duty so high upon steel that none can be imported; and yet it takes these materials, burdened with this tax, works them up into all the finer manufactures of iron, into edge tools, into saws, into fire-arms, into sewing-machines, into clocks, into table-cutlery, and does it so cheaply that they are sold in the open markets of the world and in Great Britain. Hon. Thomas H. Dudley, of Camden, N. J., late United States consul at Liverpool, and a protectionist, in an article addressed to Mr. Mongredieu, of London, said: "If you will go into your hardware stores you will see displayed for sale, imported from the United States, axes, edge-tools, forks, etc., superior in quality and finish and cheaper than you can make them."

Mr. BRUMM. Does not the gentleman from Indiana know that iron is sold in this country by the British iron manufacturers at much less rates than the ruling price in England? And does he not know that that is done for the purpose of getting rid of their surplus, and that they dump it on this country so as not to affect the English market?

Mr. BYNUM. Does the gentleman pretend to say that iron for export is sold cheaper by the English manufacturers than iron for home consumption?

Mr. BRUMM. Yes; the iron of British manufacturers is sold cheaper here than in England. And silks in France are sold on credit for export for less than they can be bought for for cash. I can show that to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. BYNUM. I do not know such to be facts. It is impossible. But the gentleman will have his own time to show that, and I should like for him to furnish the proofs.

American labor has paid $7 a ton more for its materials, paid transportation across the ocean, paid an interest upon a plant costing 50 per cent. more, and yet has made a better article and at lower cost than its British competitor. If American labor can do this, and we have the evidence of a protectionist that it has done it, take off this load that you have placed upon its shoulders and give it an equal chance, and it will drive the "pauper" labor of Europe out of the markets of the world.

This false cry of free trade has ceased to frighten the wage-workers. It is not a question of free trade, but it is a question as to whether we shall so adjust our tariff as to take advantage of the changes that have been wrought in production, trade, and commerce and give to our manufacturers and to our labor an equal chance to enter the markets of the great and growing countries south and to the southwest, and there dispose of that surplus of products, which is a constant disturbance and menace to all classes and to all industries at home.

Our present law not only excludes us from these markets, but they cripple our ability to even supply the home market, about which gentlemen are so much concerned. Last year we exported over $215,000,000 worth of cotton, which was worked up by European labor. Over one hundred and fifty millions of this went to the United Kingdom and was converted into manufactures aggregating $280,000,000, an increase in value of $130,000,000. With equal opportunities for trade and exchange we ought to have manufactured and exported a portion of this product, as it is an admitted fact that in the manufacture of the coarser cotton goods, such as new countries consume, we can compete with any nation.

We have not only been supplying Great Britain with cotton to work up and sell to other governments, but have been furnishing her industries the materials with which to manufacture a considerable amount for our own consumption. Last year we imported cotton goods to the value of $28,940,353, while we exported to the value of only $15,- 090,060, leaving our imports in excess of our exports to the extent of $13,850,293, thus showing that while some of our cotton mills were idle or running on short time with many operatives out of work we paid to foreign manufacturers over $13,000,000 for cotton goods. We not only deprived American labor of the opportunity and ability to manufacture this amount of goods, but we taxed the people by way of duties upon their purchases $11,710,719, to add to the surplus in the Treasury.

We also imported during the same period woolen goods to the value of $44,902,278, while we exported only $813,777 worth, clearly showing that while our woolen mills were closed, while their operatives were out of work, we purchased from other countries over $44,000,000 worth of woolen goods. We not only, by our so-called system of protection, deprived American labor of the opportunity to make this amount of goods, but, to add to their misfortunes, we extorted from the people by way of taxation upon what they were compelled to purchase abroad $29,279,717, to go into the surplus in the Treasury. These sums are the actual amounts paid out upon importations and do not embrace, in the slightest degree, the amount we were compelled to pay by way of increased cost upon the home product. We therefore last year deprived American operatives of the labor required to manufacture over $57,000,000 worth of cotton and woolen goods and taxed the people over $40,000,000 for the loss.

To show how American labor has been pillaged and plundered by this masked robber of protection, I have obtained from the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics a table showing our imports and exports of cotton and woolen goods for the last ten years.

Imports over exports, $350,527,683.

It will be seen from this table that we have purchased from foreign countries during the last decade over and above what we have sold to them, cotton goods to the value of $162,415,317, and woolen goods to the value of $350,527,683, and upon these sums we have collected revenues to the extent of over $350,000,000. All this has been done under the pretext that we could and would soon produce a sufficient quantity of wool to supply the home demand, while the fact is that we have imported more wool, per capita, under the existing tariff than for any similar period in our history.

There is, however, a still more striking illustration of the effects of present duties upon American industries and American labor. We have not only burthened them in order to increase the production of materials where there is a deficiency in the home product, thereby giving to European manufacturers and European labor cheaper materials to work up, but we have robbed them by placing a high rate of duty upon that class of materials of which we produce a surplus, thereby giving the American producer a monopoly of the home market, which he supplies at the foreign price, with the duty added, and then sells the surplus for exportation at free-trade prices. Take copper ore. We have the finest quality and the largest supply of copper in the world. We produce more than will supply our manufacturers, and yet the copper produced from our mines costs our manufacturers more than it does their foreign competitors. I have here a table, taken from the address of Thomas G. Bennett before the Tariff Commission, showing the production, exportation, and consumption of copper in the United States and prices of same to American manufacturers and to exporters.

Year.	Production.	Exports less imports.	Remaining for United States use.	Actual consumption.	Price to American manufacturers.	Price to exporters.
	Pounds.	Pounds.	Pounds.	Pounds.	Per pound.	Per pound.

1881	70,300,000	6,603,653	63,696,347	70,696,350	.18½	.15½

In May, 1879, 10,000,000 pounds were sold at 14 and 14½ cents per pound; in October, 1878, 2,000,000 pounds were sold at 15½ cents, and in April, 1881, 7,000,000 pounds were sold at 15½ cents, the purchasers giving bond that the same would be exported, while American consumers were compelled to pay from 17½ cents to 19½ cents a pound. I have here a table showing the exports and imports of copper during the last five years:

Years.	Imports.	Foreign exports.	Net imports.	Domestic exports.
1883	$122,536	$73,824	$48,712	$943,771

We have, it will be seen, during the last five years exported over $12,000,000 worth of copper over and above our imports, and yet during all this time we have had a duty of from 2½ cents a pound upon copper ores to 4 cents upon plates and bars. What has been the effect of this duty? In the first place, it has almost extinguished our trade with Chili, where we used to sell large quantities of our manufactures. In the second it has, by fostering higher prices in this than in other countries, prohibited great industries from springing up and flourishing. The effect of this duty has been so well stated by Everett P. Wheeler, of New York, that I quote his words. He says:

> One extraordinary illustration of the effect of the discrimination which unjust laws have made in favor of the owners of mines in this country is that, although the copper of Michigan is the best in the world, because the most ductile and therefore best adapted to the manufacture of percussion caps, cartridges, and articles of that sort, in which the thinnest and most ductile copper is necessary, yet we export few of these, whereas we ought to supply the markets of the world with them. The duty on copper has enabled mine owners to keep the price so high that, while they have exported our copper to foreign countries and sold it there for a less price than they would sell it for in America, for this very reason the finished product has been manufactured there and not here.

It has, however, been of incalculable benefit to the owners of the Calumet and Hecla mines, who, upon a capital of $2,500,000, have paid dividends since 1870 to the extent of over $30,000,000. Are workingmen to be longer deceived by this hypocritical cry of protection to American labor?

Under existing duties they have felt their burdens increasing day by day. They have become weary and restless, and when they fully discover the cause of their misfortunes woe be unto its authors.

FARMERS.

There is another class that is growing tired and whose dissatisfaction is assuming more aggressive proportions as they witness and feel the effects of this system. The farmers inquire why they should be taxed upon everything they consume, while they must find a market abroad for their surplus products. They are told that protection furnishes a better market for their products. This pretext has become stale. It has been answered so often that it scarcely merits notice. Governor Whitcomb, of Indiana, nearly a half century ago, refuted this statement so forcibly that his argument can not be improved upon. Said he:

> Let us see if the manufacturers can give us the double price for our produce. Let us see if they can consume it. In the good old times of virtue and simplicity the mother and daughter in a thrifty farmer's family did their own spinning and weaving and were able to clothe their fathers and brothers. By modern improvements most of our clothing is made in the large manufactories. Now, suppose that ten men engaged in manufacturing were to clothe as many who might be engaged in raising provisions, and that they should mutually supply each other. But the thrifty farmer and his sons could easily raise a great deal more provisions than the whole family, men and women, could eat. Ten able-bodied men on our Western farms, therefore, can furnish far more than ten puny manufacturers could consume. But this comparison would be conceding entirely too much. Calculate the number of yards of clothing, the number of hats and pairs of shoes, that the ten farmers would use in the course of a year, and then how long it would take the ten manufacturers to make those articles.

Now, the real condition of our manufactories makes the difference still greater. The great difference consists in the wonderful improvements made in machinery. It is ascertained that one man, with a spinning-machine, can produce as much yarn as two hundred and sixty-seven men can with each a one-thread wheel. Now, even if it took one manufacturer all his time to make clothing for one farmer, the same manufacturer, with the assistance of a machine, could make enough, from the above calculation, to clothe two hundred and sixty-seven farmers. But this labor-saving machinery has but one mouth to feed (the man who tends it), and one farmer, by planting a few more rows of corn, could stuff that mouth into an apoplexy. What will the other two hundred and sixty-six farmers do with their surplus produce?

The improvements in machinery have been much greater since that time than before. Not only can one hand raise more corn and more wheat than at that time, but one hand can more than thribble the product in manufactures. The cost of manufactured articles has not only been greatly reduced, but the quantity has been largely increased per capita. The value of manufactured articles per head in 1850 was $44; in 1860, $65, and in 1880, $107; the reduction in price was not less than 50 per cent., so that our production in 1880 as compared with 1850 was something near 4 to 1. There was also a great increase of agricultural products per head. The improvements in farming implements and in the knowledge of farming were so great that our surplus of wheat in 1880 exceeded our entire crop of 1860. In 1860 we produced 173,104,924 bushels of wheat, less than 6 bushels per capita, while in 1880 our crop was 498,594,868 bushels, nearly 10 bushels per capita. The value of live-stock in 1860 was $1,107,500,000, less than $40 per head, while in 1880 it reached $5,000,000,000, nearly $100 per head.

We have therefore increased fourfold the quantity of manufactures per inhabitant, while we have nearly doubled the ratio of agricultural products. Upon one side our manufactories have increased in number and capacity until we are unable to consume their goods and wares, and upon the other our farmers have, by the improvements in machinery and in farming, increased the quantity of their products until we are able to export annually from five to seven hundred millions of dollars' worth. In this condition, with a surplus of manufactures and a surplus of agricultural products, the manufacturers say to the farmers, give us higher protection and we will increase the number of our mills and the number of employés till we are able to consume all your products! Now, when they make such a proposition will they please tell us where and to whom they expect to sell their manufactures, because if they have no market they can not employ operatives, and if the operatives have no work they can not consume to any large extent.

The great body of wage-workers are not employed in industries fostered by the tariff; more than four-fifths of them are at work in "unprotected" avocations. It is safe to estimate that not more than a million of persons are employed in manufactures which derive any benefit from protection. Supposing that all are men of families, not more than five millions of beings are supported from wages derived from industries fostered by "protection." Each person consumes about 6 bushels of wheat per annum. The entire population sustained by our manufacturing industries, which claim that they can not survive without high duties, do not consume over 30,000,000 bushels of wheat per annum. The State of Indiana has produced in a single year 55,000,000 bushels. She can supply her own people, bread the entire population dependent upon "protected" industries, and still have a surplus of 10,000,000 bushels for exportation.

In the face of these facts, in the face of the fact that we already have a surplus in many lines of manufacture, it is proposed to increase the number of mills and the number of operatives more than fivefold. Was ever anything more absurd than this home-market theory for our agricultural products?

With a country unparalleled in resources, a soil inexhaustible, mountains and valleys rich in ores and minerals, a climate at once inspiring and ennobling, with the highest standard of intelligence and skill of any people in the world, it is proposed that henceforth our energies shall be exhausted in producing what we shall consume and in consuming what we shall produce.

Shall we, after having developed the highest civilization, gained the greatest freedom, and established immutably a government based upon intelligence, acknowledge our inability to cope with the other nations and surrender to them the future glory of the world's progress.

Great Britain found that she could not produce everything at home as cheaply as she could purchase the same abroad and she opened wide her doors to the commerce of the world and became the wealthiest nation upon earth. France, Germany, and Belgium, unable to produce a sufficient supply of food and materials within their own limits, opened their ports for the importation of these, and are able by this means to give employment to their overcrowded population and thereby enable them to exchange the products of their labor for a subsistence; and yet we, with all our boundless resources, able as we are to supply the inhabitants of all these countries with food, able as we are to supply South America and Australasia with manufactures for the wool we must have, say to the labor upon our rich lands: "Cease; we want no surplus;" say to the wage-workers in our mills and factories: "Stop; we want nothing made to send abroad." The inevitable result of such a policy will not be to develop our great resources, but to strangle our industries, destroy our prosperity, and pauperize our labor.

Mr. Chairman, there is such a thing as a home market, but there is no such thing as an exclusive home market. Whatever prohibitions are placed upon commerce limit the opportunities of labor, limit production, limit exchange, and limit consumption. It should be our policy not to adjust our tariff law so as to restrict the advantages of our industries and the capacity of our labor, but to enlarge them to the utmost boundaries.

We place a high duty upon wool, it is said, to encourage the growth of wool until we shall raise a sufficient quantity to supply ourselves; but in our endeavors to stimulate the growth of wool we have excluded our manufacturers of machines, of furniture, of engines, of boots and shoes, and other products from the markets of South America and Australasia, and are annually losing the sale of more labor than could possibly be employed in tending sheep, even if it was profitable for us to produce the wool we consume, under the present rates of duty. We are practically excluded from the markets of these countries, rapidly increasing in wealth and population. Take our trade with the Argentine Republic with her wool, Brazil with her coffee, and Chili with her copper, and compare it with the trade of Great Britain.

	Argentine Republic.	Brazil.	Chili.	Total.
Population	2,406,000	10,108,201	2,400,396	.....

Imports from United States	4,347,293	7,317,293	2,211,007	13,875,693

Great Britain sold to these countries over seventy-four millions of dollars' worth, while we sold only thirteen millions' worth. Great Britain had a balance of thirty-two millions in her favor while the balance was against us to the extent of thirty-six millions of dollars.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Is not that state of facts to be attributed to the better communication of Great Britain with these countries by steamship lines?

Mr. BYNUM. Yes; and for that very reason that when you destroyed our commerce you destroyed our carrying trade, and now you come knocking at the doors of Congress for subsidies. [Applause.]

Mr. MILLIKEN. Is it not true that our commerce has doubled in that time?

Mr. BYNUM. It is larger now than then, but as compared with the growth of commerce and the growth of the trade of these countries our trade is a mere bagatelle now.

Mr. DINGLEY. Do I understand the gentleman from Indiana to say that our commerce with any of these South American countries has fallen off since the war?

Mr. BYNUM. In comparison with the growth of the countries and of trade, immeasurably so. Great Britain has distanced us in supplying these countries with manufactures.

Mr. DINGLEY. Has it not increased faster than our population? Is it not the fact that our exports and imports have not fallen off? They have vastly increased. But the percentage of commerce carried by American vessels has decreased since 1855, and it fell off most between 1855 and 1861.

Mr. BYNUM. The aggregate of our exports and imports have increased. It is true our carrying trade did fall off between 1855 and 1861. The decline during these years was owing to the change in the materials of which vessels were built. Had it not been for high rates of duties upon materials that were used, after these years we would soon have recovered and maintained our supremacy upon the seas.

If I only had time to read from an article written by Mr. Ricardo Beccerra, chief of the bureau of commercial statistics of Chili, and published in our consular reports, I could soon show the destruction of our trade with that government.

Mr. DINGLEY. Does the gentleman refer to the carrying of these imports and exports?

Mr. BYNUM. I think the gentleman from Maine proposes to make a speech instead of asking a question, and I shall have to insist on his doing so in his own time.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Will the gentleman allow me one further question?

Mr. BYNUM. There are other gentlemen to follow me, and I am occupying their time. It is not fair to them that I should yield to these interruptions, and I must proceed.

There is, however, a better illustration of the insignificance of our foreign commerce. Take the trade of Australasia for the last ten years, the largest wool-producing country in the world, a country with an abundance of the very materials we want, and desiring the class of manufactures of which we have a large surplus.

Statement showing imports and exports of British Australasia for each year from 1877 to 1886, inclusive, also showing imports and exports of the United States to and from same for said years.

*Fraction over 1 per cent.

Here we find a country with an annual trade of about five hundred millions of dollars. During the last ten years this country has imported products to the value of $2,643,800,151, and of this sum we only supplied $81,381,045, a fraction over 3 per cent. While we sold to her people only eighty-one millions' worth of products, the United Kingdom sold to them $1,161,683,502 worth, and received in exchange a large supply of their raw materials, which were afterwards sold to us with commissions, freights, storage, and profits added.

Mr. DINGLEY. Will the gentleman from Indiana permit a simple inquiry?

Mr. BYNUM. The gentleman from Maine can answer all these matters in his own time.

Mr. DINGLEY. But the gentleman is proceeding on the assumption that our commerce——

Mr. BYNUM. I can not yield.

Mr. DINGLEY. I supposed the gentleman would like to have the fact stated.

Mr. BYNUM. Does the gentleman dispute that that is the fact? If he does, let him offer his statement in his own time and in the proper way. He can not controvert the facts I have stated, but if he wishes to try to do so, let him do it in his own time.

It is remarkable that the natural channels of trade have been so obstructed by our laws that these new countries, rapidly increasing in population and growing in wealth, with abundance of just such materials as we must have and requiring just such manufactures as we can supply, are now receiving from us yearly over fifty millions of dollars in money.

It is not, therefore, strange that while we have conducted our trade and commerce upon such principles that out of a production of gold and silver to the extent of two thousand five hundred millions of dollars in the last forty years only about one-third of it is in the country to-day.

It is contended that a duty on wool is a necessary protection to our farmers. It is strange that the protectionists have by the mere assertion of the truth of this statement been able to pull the wool over the eyes of many of our farmers, and thus secure their support in sustaining a measure which has plundered them at home and abroad; at home upon what they have consumed and abroad upon what they have exported. How has protection benefited the wool-growers? Has not the price of wool steadily fallen since 1867, when the highest rate of duty was placed upon it? The advocates of protection admit this—not only admit it, but many of them claim it as the result of "protection." Mr. Haskell, a leading member of this House from Kansas, in 1882 said:

I have here the figures. To-day wool is cheaper per pound, and has been for the past five years, than it was from 1855 to 1860 under the free-trade rating of the free-trade party.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Then how are you going to get cheaper clothing by cheaper wool?

Mr. BYNUM. That question I think I will answer, I think to the satisfaction of the gentleman from Maine, as I proceed.

To show exactly what has taken place by way of a fall in prices, I have prepared a table giving the price of wool for four years preceding the act of 1867; for four years succeeding the same; for four years preceding the act of 1883, when there was a reduction of about 10 per cent., and for the last four years.

Year.	Price per pound.	Year.	Price per pound.	Year.	Price per pound.	Year.	Price per pound.
	Cents.		Cents.		Cents.		Cents.
1863	75	1868	46	1879	37	1884	34
1864	100	1869	48	1880	46	1885	31
1865	75	1870	46	1881	42	1886	33
1866	70	1871	62	1882	42	1887	38
Four y'rs' average.	80		50½		41¾		34

The average price of wool for four years preceding the act of 1867 was 80 cents a pound; while for four years succeeding it was only 50 cents a pound. For four years preceding the reduction in 1883 it averaged 41¾ cents a pound, and for the last four years it has averaged only 34 cents a pound. It can not be claimed that the reduction in price during the last four years was the result of the reductions in 1883, as the reductions of duty were only 10 per cent., while the fall in price has been much larger. The fall in the price of wool has gone on uninterruptedly ever since the duty was increased in 1867. Of what benefit, then, has "protection" been to the wool-grower?

Mr. Stebbins, in his work on Protection, following the suggestion of the Tariff Commission, has explained or undertaken to explain wherein the wool-growers have been benefited. He says:

Its results as to wool are given in the Tariff Commission report, and can be stated as follows: Sheep, 1860, 22,471,275; 1880, 43,576,897. Pounds of wool in 1860, 60,264,913; in 1880, 240,000,000, or twice as much per head as in 1860. Prices in Boston in currency averaged in 1867, 51 cents; in 1875, 43 cents; in 1880, 48 cents. The price is a little lower, but the sum from each fleece nearly double, as the results of improved breeds under protective encouragement and with a home market.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Has not that increased under protection?

Mr. BYNUM. What? The number?

Mr. MILLIKEN. Yes.

Mr. BYNUM. Oh, yes. I suppose protection was the cause of the discovery of the arid region and of the large increase of cattle and horses and mules. No doubt of it. I suppose the gentleman will claim before we get through that protection is the cause of the increase of population and of the discovery of natural gas. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

"What sophistry will not avarice resort to." The price has fallen, but under "protective encouragement" the fleece has grown larger. I submit that such a policy imposes too much labor on the sheep. [Laughter and applause.] The poor sheep, however, have had to abandon the contest; they have been unable to keep up with the rapid decline of prices, the clip remaining about the same per head as in 1880, while the price has fallen over 14 cents a pound. The statement of protectionists that the total clip of 1860 was only 60,264,913 pounds is not correct. It has been stated by the most careful examiners that it was, in reality, over 116,000,000 of pounds.

Mr. Chairman, let us try to ascertain the truth about this subject. I do not claim that the reduction in the price of wool since 1867 is the result, solely, of the high duty placed upon it, but I do think it is one of the causes which have brought about such a radical reduction. The establishment of large ranches in Texas, New Mexico, and Colorado, where lands and pasturage could be had at nominal rates, and sheep kept at a much less cost per head than in the Northern States, had a marked influence upon the price. In 1867 New Mexico, Texas, and Colorado contained but 1,454,717 head, while in 1885 they contained 14,155,343. Wool can be raised much cheaper in Texas and New Mexico than in Ohio, Michigan, and Indiana, and this illustrates the great fallacy of trying to protect the production of materials which can be grown in one section of the country at one-half the cost in another.

The CHAIRMAN (at twenty minutes past 1 o'clock). The time of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM] has expired.

Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. MILLIKEN. I hope the gentleman's time will be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I trust that the gentleman will be allowed whatever time he requires to conclude his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the time of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM] be extended indefinitely. Is there objection?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Upon that, Mr. Chairman, I desire to say this: I shall not object to the extension of the time of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM], nor of the time of the gentleman who is to follow him; but as propositions to debate this tariff bill at evening sessions or to allow members to print their remarks upon it are opposed on the other side, I give notice now that I shall insist hereafter that no gentleman's time shall be extended until some arrangement is made between the two sides of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM] will proceed.

Mr. BYNUM. I thank the House for its courtesy, and I shall not trespass upon it unduly.

Why tax the people of Minnesota and Dakota upon their clothing that wool may be grown in Ohio and Pennsylvania? The truth of the matter is that you can not stimulate the production of wool by a high tariff. With us the raising of sheep is not for the wool, but for the meat. Farmers in the Northern States and in all the States will always raise sheep, and the number of head will increase as population increases without any protection. Farmers will raise sheep because a certain number can always be profitably kept upon any farm. They assist in cultivating the land, they eat down the briars and shrubs and clean up the hillsides, thus saving much labor and expense, and whatever the wool brings is clear profit. The profit in raising sheep, except where the climate is mild and pasturage abundant, is not in the wool, but in the mutton. With free wool the United Kingdom upon her 121,751 square miles in 1886 had 28,955,240 head of sheep, while Ohio, Indiana, and Michigan, three great wool-growing States, upon their 139,028 square miles had only 8,111,158 head. France, upon her 204,- 030 square miles, in 1885 had 22,616,542 head, while Maine, New York, Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Virginia, and Maryland, upon their 200,476 square miles, had only 5,020,053 head. Germany, with her 208,624 square miles, in 1883 had 19,189,715 head, while Texas, upon her 274,356 square miles, had only 7,877,500 head, and this number has been diminished over 3,000,000 head in the last four years.

Mr. MILLIKEN. The falling off in number was owing to the reduction of the tariff on wool in 1883.

Mr. BYNUM. Will the gentleman answer why it is that the greatest falling off in the number of sheep has been in Texas, where wool is produced cheaper than anywhere else?

Mr. MILLIKEN. Perhaps they have found something else that they can make more profitably.

Mr. BYNUM. Certainly; and our people in Ohio, Indiana, and Michigan and the other States, when they become as wise, will discover that they can raise wheat and corn and pork and purchase their wool for one-half what they are paying for it now. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The United States, with twenty years of protection, has about 14 head of sheep to the square mile, while Germany, with free wool, has 92 head; France, with free wool, 100 head, and the United Kingdom, with free wool, 235 head to the square mile. The number of sheep in the United Kingdom is 85 per cent. of the population, in France 58 per cent., and in the United States 75 per cent. Why this equality in the number of sheep as compared to population, and great inequality as to area of territory? It must be that it requires about this proportion to raise the mutton consumed by the inhabitants. In 1884 we had, in round numbers, 50,000,000 sheep; but in 1887 this number was reduced to 44,000,000, not because there was no demand for wool—we imported large quantities of wool and even shoddy during these years—but because we had surpassed the number required to raise the mutton consumed by us. In 1885 we exported over a half million head, not to produce wool, but for slaughter.

The wool-growers of Pennsylvania and Ohio stated to the Tariff Commission that it cost them from $2 to $2.04 a year to keep a sheep. The fleece averaging 6 pounds, the wool would have to bring 33⅓ cents a pound to pay expenses; adding a reasonable sum for shearing, handling, interest, etc., it is fair to estimate that wool can not be raised in these States for less than 40 cents a pound.

We consume annually 600,000,000 pounds; this, at 40 cents, would cost $240,000,000. We can purchase foreign wools, and pay for them in the products of labor, for one-half this sum. Now, why make the people of the United States pay a hundred millions more for their wool in order to have it all produced at home? Protectionists say, to build up home industries and employ home labor! But this is just what we are not doing by this policy. We have seen how we have injured our cotton mills, our woolen mills, and all of our industries manufacturing implements and machinery.

In countries where the profit is in raising mutton the demand for mutton will control and regulate the number of sheep, and by no system of protection can the number of sheep be increased above that point. In countries where wool can be grown at comparative little cost, and the profit to the shepherd is not in slaughtering but in shearing his sheep, there the wool will be grown to clothe the people in the colder climates; and to exclude the same from our shores is not only destruction to our woolen mills, but it is a serious blow to every other industry and to every individual throughout the whole country, and to none is it more detrimental than to that great body of our people who live by their hands.

The condition of our woolen manufacturers is well known. They have been struggling for existence under a protection too burdensome for the people to longer tolerate. Their condition has been well described in a letter, by one of their number, published in the Boston Herald of February 18, 1888. He says:

> In addition to the mills I have mentioned as now shut down, I will state for your information, if you do not already know it, that since 1880 29 woolen mills and 135 sets of machinery have been destroyed by fire in New England, and have not been replaced—a fact which proves more forcibly than can any words of mine the unprofitableness of the woolen manufacture and the folly of a protective policy which closes against it the world's markets at the same time that this country is importing woolen goods to the value of $45,000,000 annually. And in this connection I will ask your attention to the following table:

This table shows that in the country at large, in the ten years between 1870 and 1880, the number of woolen mills decreased over 31 per cent., and the sets of cards over 28 per cent. Or, if we confine our attention to our own vicinity, in New England the decrease in mills has been nearly 20 per cent., and in sets of cards over 13 per cent. Is not this a significant hint of the extreme prosperity which the tariff has brought to wool manufacturing in this "favored country?" And yet it was during this period that the very highest tariff rates prevailed.

It is useless for us to ignore the fact that we must place wool on the free-list or our woolen manufacturers will have to succumb. They can not live under this high rate of duty upon wool, and they know that the time has passed when they can ask the great masses to shoulder heavier burthens.

Mr. Chairman, it has been heralded far and wide that this bill is a blow at American industries; that it will reduce wages to the level of the countries of Europe, and yet the opponents of the same have been unable to show, in a single instance, where any manufacture is to be harmed by any of its provisions. A majority of the committee which reported it has been denounced because they were unwilling to devote the entire session of Congress to hearing the misrepresentations of those who have oppressed and plundered the people by trusts, pools, and combinations.

Amongst the number that came arrogantly knocking at the doors of the committee demanding to be heard were the pine-lumber dealers of the Pacific slope. In the New York Tribune of March 18 last, on page 3, is contained a copy of a petition which, it was said, was to be presented to the Committee on Ways and Means by some of the representatives of California, protesting against the destruction of the lumber and shipping industries of the Pacific coast, and denouncing the committee for having refused a hearing to the parties. The destruction of these interests which is to follow the passage of this bill is graphically described in this memorial. I quote the following:

> British Columbia would have more saw-mills than are now in California, Oregon, and Washington Territory, supplying lumber to our people. Foreign houses will establish branches at each coast port, and the entire manufacturing and hauling trade will be in alien hands, leaving the American citizens who pay taxes nothing but the privilege of paying cost and profit to the alien who does not. In other words, the Mills tariff bill gives to foreigners, without cost, the markets which our own people have created and our own people are able to supply, to the utter destruction on this coast of American interests in lumber, coal, and especially in shipping.

What a picture of destruction! What an appeal to our patriotism! The hypocricy of this claim and pretext, however, is found in the very same issue of the paper. Turning over to page 11 I find, in a dispatch from San Francisco, dated March 17, the following:

> The pine-lumber pool has succeeded during the past year in advancing the prices of lumber $12 to $15 per thousand, on the ground of high shipping rates and increased wages. The grounds for the advance are trivial, as the wages of the men are only $5 more per month and the running expenses of the vessels are no greater. The pool, which has adopted all the methods of newly invented trusts, has simply made the people of California pay about one and a half millions into its pocket. It controls ships and mills, and regulates the prices of pine lumber to suit itself.

It is remarkable that with this condition of affairs no representative of the people came rapping at the door of the committee. The only demand to be heard was in behalf of the trust which had plundered them of a million and a half of dollars and was anxious to retain its grasp.

Mr. Chairman, the last and certainly the weakest argument that has been urged against the passage of the bill under discussion and in favor of higher duties upon imports is that we should increase duties so as to prohibit importations and thereby raise the price of all products, in order that we may not, in case of a sudden attack or invasion, be dependent upon other countries for supplies. The time, probably, has not arrived when all strife between nations shall cease; "when swords shall be beaten into plowshares and spears into pruning-hooks;" but we have reached that period in the world's history and in the progress of the human race when it is no longer necessary to keep sentinels upon the watch tower to awaken the sleeping inhabitants to defend the city against an armed foe bent upon rapine and plunder.

The time was when the Roman armies plundered and pillaged the citizens of every country from Africa to Britain; when the proudest achievement of man was to lead in triumph back to Rome a victorious army laden with the spoils of conquest; but to-day the glory and the triumph of men and of nations is not in the invasion of a foreign land and the subjection of its citizens to the payment of extortionate tributes and princely ransoms, to be squandered upon grand pageants and in the celebration of magnificent fêtes; but it is, bearing a nation's emblem, to plow the seas and enter the harbors of every country, freighted with the achievements of skill, of industry, of "peace on earth and good will towards men," and place them in the grand temples dedicated to the goddesses of progress and of civilization. To declare that it is necessary for us to compel one class of citizens to pay tribute to another, in order that we may constantly be prepared for a sudden invasion upon every side, is to declare that the great lights which have illumined the world and inspired the hopes of mankind for two thousand years may go out in a twinkling. As for myself, I indulge in no such fears. Rather than dwell in the ages of the past, clad in armor, with spear in hand, I prefer to live in the present, and in the glorious anticipation of a higher and grander future, when all nations shall be banded together in one solemn compact to peaceably arbitrate all differences. [Great applause.]

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana, took the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state that by some proceedings which took place in the committee while the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM] was speaking, it was understood that the other gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] should be permitted to occupy the floor until the conclusion of his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, that our annual revenues are in excess of our ordinary expenditures is not necessarily to be deplored. It affords no just occasion for alarm. This condition of the Treasury is by no means a new one. On June 30, 1868, the surplus was over $85,000,000; in December, 1880, it reached $90,000,000, and in the year following it was found to be $60,000,000. Neither Johnson nor Grant, Hayes nor Arthur made these healthful Treasury conditions a pretext for suggesting a disturbance of our industrial system. There was neither financial convulsion nor wide-spread disaster. On the contrary, thecountry continued to have an unparalleled prosperity.

There are national needs to which the surplus may be wisely applied and the danger avoided of making the Treasury a hoarding place of the currency of the people.

Large sums of money, I admit, should not lie idle in the Treasury; but there is no occasion for this when there are legitimate public purposes inviting its expenditure. This accumulating revenue gives the opportunity, and might be made the occasion, for doing much for the people. It should be so expended as to certainly contribute to the nation's prosperity and greatness. It is true that money should not be "needlessly withdrawn from trade and the people's use;" but taxes, not excessive or burdensome, may be collected and so returned to the channels of business as to develop not "cripple" our national energies; promote not retard "our country's development," and stimulate rather than discourage "productive enterprise." National expenditures should always be made without prodigality and for such public purposes as will promote the general wellfare. Neither the presence of a surplus in the Treasury nor our large collections of revenue is a menace to our prosperity. There is no occasion for hoarding this money or withdrawing it from circulation.

Our interest-bearing debt is $1,000,000,000, and why not reduce it now that we are able to do so? This use of the surplus is expressly authorized by law. Why has it not been so employed? In this day of the Treasury's prosperity it would be a wise economy to extinguish a part of the national debt. The uses to which our surplus may be wisely applied are numerous. There, in a most deplorable condition, is our merchant marine. Why not aid it so it may be able to resume not only the carrying of our own foreign trade, but compete also on equal terms with the vessels of other nations for the carrying trade of the world. Not long ago our attention was called, by one who was then the most notable man in the Democratic party, to the necessity for making provision, and immediate provision, for the defense of our seaboard cities. Would it not be well to heed this warning and provide against this danger. It is a fact the world knows that we have an unprotected seacoast, thousands of miles in extent, and populous seaboard cities with their thousands of millions of property at the mercy of the hostile navies of even the smaller powers of Europe. Why not provide harbor and coast defenses, or build a navy commensurate with our greatness and glory as a people? A distinguished Irish-American, formerly a member of this House, in a banquet speech the other day, in discussing this subject, said:

> And as for the surplus, Mr. President and gentlemen, a surplus can not be said to exist when there is room for its expenditure—and legitimate room. We have now, I believe, somewhat over $200,000,000 in the Treasury. We had a fisheries dispute the other day; suppose that England and American disagreed; suppose the whole matter was referred to the arbitrament of the sword, where would our Atlantic seaboard be, where would our Pacific seaboard be, where would our lake seaboard be? Canadian gunboats could come here through the deepened Welland canal, bombard your city, and you have not got a single fort, ship, or gun with which to defend it.
> They talk of a surplus in the Treasury, and we have not a fortification that could stop a cannon-ball; we have not a ship of war capable of standing a broadside from a single first-class man-of-war of any power of Europe. They talk of a surplus in the Treasury, and sixty millions of people, in the event of sudden war—which I hope may never come—are absolutely defenseless. They talk of a surplus in the Treasury, with water ways left unconstructed. They talk of that surplus as if it were a curse instead of an attestation of the prosperity of our country. They have thrown out on the seas a few cruisers—provided, I believe, by Republican administrations—but the Navy of the United States remains in such a condition that every patriotic American is ashamed of it; not alone ashamed of it, but afraid of it.

Notwithstanding the prowess of our sailors and seamen, our naval establishment excites more derision than fear.

But, Mr. Chairman, I can not leave this line of suggestion without inviting attention to a subject demanding favorable consideration. The survivors of the Army of the Union are now "venerable in age," and it is time "a grateful people were tendering them a parting benediction." The last Congress did this for the surviving conquerors of Mexico, and the President unhesitatingly approved the expenditure. I can not allow myself to believe a measure of equal justice can be much longer withheld by Congress from the heroic soldiery of the Army of the Republic. Will a hostile Congress defeat it, or will it again be arrested by a Presidential veto? The existence of a surplus, I have already said, affords no excuse for unnecessary or extravagant expenditures, but it fortunately just now enables the nation without embarrassment and without imposing a burden upon the people to do what is just. It affords us an opportunity for rescuing from want and the almshouse the 10,000 worn-out and impoverished veterans who are dependent upon public or private charity. Penury to-day shadows the homes and lives of thousands of brave men who gallantly followed our flag. Are these men to suffer on through the remnant of their lives without substantial recognition by the Government they served so faithfully? Shall either a people's parsimony or forgetfulness remit them to a life of beggary?

I have named but a few of the important national objects upon which our resources might be expended, not only without waste, but with profit. Besides those mentioned there are great rivers and harbors to be improved in the interest of commerce, and a system of education provided for unfortunate illiterates that the nation may have a purer and more intelligent suffrage and a better government. In view of these facts, why should we be in hot haste to overturn or disturb a revenue system to which our industrial pursuits have adjusted themselves? National taxation is not onerous. The people have entered no protest, uttered no complaint. That the tariff on foreign products is burdensome or a Treasury surplus dangerous they do not believe. That under our protective system our industries have been extended and diversified until we have become the foremost among the manufacturing and agricultural peoples they know, and with our present protective system they are content. That a surplus exists is evidence of our prosperity; that it has been gathered into the Treasury without oppression or complaint is evidence that our revenue laws are wise and just.

I believe, sir, if the surplus were under the supervision of a wise statesmanship, one capable of applying it to proper objects, it would be a national blessing; but as it is safer to reduce it than to run the hazard of an ill-advised expenditure, I am ready and anxious to aid in a judicious revision of our methods of taxation so as to reduce our revenues to the lowest limit of our national wants. But how reduce the revenues? Our revenues are principally raised, first, from duties levied upon manufactures, the product of foreign workshops and foreign labor imported into our markets from abroad; and second, from internal-revenue taxes imposed on the production by our own people of tobacco and liquors. To be exact I will give the several sources from which the Government obtains its revenues. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, we collected:

From customs	$217,286,893.13
From internal revenue	118,823,391.22
From sales of public lands	9,254,286.42
From profits on coinage, bullion deposits, and assays	8,929,252.83
From tax on national banks	2,385,851.18
From fees—consular, letters patent, and land	3,301,647.16
From customs fees, fines, penalties, etc	1,053,037.86
From sales of Indian lands	1,479,028.81
From Soldiers' Home permanent fund	1,226,259.47
From sinking fund for Pacific railways	1,364,435.87
From repayment of interest by Pacific railways	914,793.13
From sales of old public buildings	624,882.20
From sales of Government property	262,832.32
From immigrant fund	258,402.50
From tax on seal-skins	317,452.75
From deposits by individuals for surveying public lands	94,289.76
From revenues of the District of Columbia	2,267,869.01
From miscellaneous sources	1,458,672.04
Total ordinary receipts	371,403,277.66

There is, in the President's opinion, no just cause of complaint of internal-revenue taxation. The reduction, in whatever sum it may be made, he insists shall be had by a revision of the tariff laws. These laws are denounced as "the vicious, inequitable, and illogical source of unnecessary taxation." There seems to be some confusion as to the amount of tax reduction necessary to be made. The Secretary of the Treasury suggests $100,000,000, and the message informs the country that the revenues over the needs of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30 next are expected to be $113,000,000. To bring the income down to the necessities of the Government, "economically administered," the sum, or one of the sums stated, must be taken from the duties on imports.

So far as results are concerned it is of little difference in which sum the reduction is made. As the President is the progenitor of this method of reduction, I will briefly discuss its results should his suggestion be adopted. Last year we collected from tariff duties $217,286,893. Deduct the sum of the surplus given by the President and we reduce tariff taxation by more than one-half. This would bring the sum derived from this source down to a fraction over $104,000,000. Such a policy would stop many a mill wheel and factory spindle, put out many a forge and furnace fire, and drive thousands of wage-workers from the fields of remunerative toil to idleness and want. It is said, however, that "the tariff must be extensively used as the source of the Government's income." It is to be used as a source of income, not to "promote the healthy growth of domestic industries—not to give American labor the ability to successfully compete with foreign labor." How quickly the pledges of a Democratic platform seem to be forgotten! In the discussion of this question in this dignified State paper the relation of the tariff to our home industries and to American labor is dismissed from consideration with an indefinite suggestion that the interest of the one should be "considered" and that of the other "should not be imperiled."

While it does not in the persuasive oratory of the revenue reformer denounce protection the device of the monopolist and a scheme of plunder, its whole logic is in support of free trade—of the cold theory that "in this economic problem there is no question of broader and deeper import than that of buying cheap and selling dear." We are gravely told that "the question of free trade is wholly irrelevant," when, if the argument be accepted, free trade is the inevitable result.

His is the language and the logic of the free-trader. It is the sum and substance of that doctrine as taught by Adam Smith, and by every apostle of free trade from his day to the present. It is approved and the message glorified by every advocate of that policy in Europe and America. I quote a brief extract or two from British free-trade journals to show how the message is interpreted by them. They do not seem to think the "question of free trade wholly irrelevant:"

[The Glasgow Herald.]

"It is a condition which confronts us; not a theory." Precisely so. Words almost identical with these have been used, and with enormous effect, in this country by Adam Smith, by Richard Cobden, by Sir Robert Peel. President Cleveland may say to others, therefore, and think what he chooses, but he has precipitated the inevitable struggle between free trade and protection in the United States, and that is tantamount to saying that he is on the side of free trade.

[The London Iron and Steel Trades Journal.]

The facts set forth in the President's message, though by no means new, are now brought so prominently under the notice of the American Congress and of American citizens that a violent stimulus must be given to the party which advocates entire freedom of trade.

[The London Ironmonger.]

Dealing with the message as it stands, it would certainly seem to indicate a greater leaning towards free-trade principles on the part of the United States Cabinet than has been observable hitherto.

"Mr. Cleveland's policy," said the Times, "may not establish free trade in the strict sense of the term, but it will to a great extent make trade free."

"The President," said the Daily News, "does not seem to perceive the effect of his own arguments, or even the meaning of his own words. His statement that the question of free trade is irrelevant is astounding and preposterous. Mr. Cleveland has persuaded himself to think, or finds it convenient to say, that the principle of fostering native industries by duties on foreign imports can be made compatible with the principle of regulating the burdens upon the people by the needs of the public service. It is pure delusion. Protection, albeit indefensible, is the height of wisdom compared with proposals which combine all the evils of interference with all the risks of liberty.

"His real meaning is that the scheme by which the artificial fabric of domestic enterprise has been built up in America is fundamentally vicious. He demands in effect that there should be a tariff for revenue purposes only."

[From "A member of Parliament" by cable to the free-trade New York Herald.]

To convert the United States is indeed a triumph. The Cobden Club will henceforth set up a special shrine for the worship of President Cleveland, and send him all its publications gratis. Cobden founded free trade; Cleveland saved it. Such is the burden of the song all through England to-day.

The Saturday Review, recognized as one of the leading organs of English thought, in discussing President Cleveland's message, says:

"At home the President's message must, whether his policy is adopted or not, have a profound influence on American politics, if only by bringing forward a great question of administration to be fought over between the two parties which divide the bulk of the nation. With the election of Grover Cleveland the question of civil-service reform came to the front, and now free trade, under certain limitations, mainly of a nominal kind, has followed. It may be taken for granted that the President has not acted without previously consulting the leaders of the Democratic party and securing their approval. He and they have taken up again the old free-trade policy of the South Carolina politicians, unconnected with what, in the jargon of American politics, was called the sectional question. There must now be a struggle of parties on a great question. * * * In America the choice must sooner or later—unless the Federal Government finds some way of spending a great deal more money—be between the remission of custom dues or their maintenance, not for purposes of revenue, but wholly and solely in order to protect native industry. The latter course would be worthy of the imaginary economists who drew up the petition of the lampmakers of Paris. President Cleveland has decided to force on the decision. He declines cautiously to dub himself a free-trader, but he takes up the free-trade position without disguise. * * * It must be taken to prove that the President and the Democratic leaders have finally decided that they have nothing to gain by keeping measure any longer with the protectionists. They have, from whatever motive, resolved to adopt a free-trade policy. Nothing can be more explicit than the President's language: 'The simple and plain duty which we owe the people is to reduce taxation to the amount requisite to meet the necessary expenses of the Government, and to restore to business and to the country the money accumulated in the Treasury.' In America this means free trade."

The Spectator, another leading paper, says of the message:

"His terse and telling message has struck a blow at American protection such as could never have been struck by any fair-trade league—such, indeed, as would have been greatly weakened by the operations of any fair-trade league. * * * He has fired a shot at the protectionists which will be all the more effective for his refusal to discuss the theoretic issue."

It may be said by the President's apologists that his policy is not a free-trade one because he does not propose unrestricted and untaxed importations. If nothing less than this is free trade, Switzerland is perhaps the only free-trade nation in the world. England, free-trade England, with her Cobden Club statesmanship, raises nearly $100,000,000 yearly by a tariff so adjusted as to afford no protection whatever to the industries of her people.

Duties levied by a government on such commodities as its people do not produce affords no protection, and such a revenue system is consistent with the tone and spirit of the message. Such a system, one for revenue only, abandons home manufactures to an unequal contest with the products of the cheap labor of all of the peoples of the world.

In discussing a question so far reaching in its consequences it is our duty to look beyond the mere matters of legislation before us and inquire into the effects of the policy it suggests on the future prosperity and independence of the Republic. To raise all necessary revenue from duties imposed on foreign articles which do not compete with American manufactures at all would not be difficult.

Let us see if this is true. Last year our ordinary expenditures were $315,500,000, and I assume this to be the sum, or about the sum, of our yearly needs. How could we raise this sum on the free-trade or tariff-for-revenue plan? We must, as the President recommends, retain internal-revenue taxes, which will yield hereafter $120,000,000. Our revenues are and will continue to be $36,000,000 at least from the sale of lands and from miscellaneous sources. Put a tariff on tea and raise $30,000,000; on coffee and raise $40,000,000 more. We have but to keep a duty on sugar, a duty for revenue only, to raise $60,000,000. From these sources alone we can secure with ease $286,000,000, or but $30,000,000 less than our last year's expenditures. This sum—indeed, twice this sum—can be raised from duties put on other non-competing articles. This system withdraws all protection, and to this end we may come at last. To this result the President's policy inevitably leads us.

This is the doctrine and the ultimate purpose of the free-trade Democracy. I am not now combatting it, but trying to point out the end to which the policy leads. The message does not directly advise a reduction of duties in a sum equal to that named as a surplus, but that is the suggestion.

I repeat, therefore, that to make a reduction in a sum equal to the surplus named, and to take it equally from each dutiable article, would decrease each duty one-half. It would, in fact, be necessary to take a greater per cent. than that from each duty, for lower duties often increase revenues by inviting increased importations.

But another method of tariff reduction is suggested. It is said the tariff should first be taken off those dutiable articles which are generally used by the people. I think it is conceded that the goods which are most generally consumed are manufactures of woolens, cottons, iron, steel, hemp, leather, silks, earthenware, china, glass and glassware, and paper, and the revenue of all these last year amounted to but $90,000,000. Add to this the sum derived from the duty on all raw material, and the amount is $102,856,913. Put all these manufactures and this raw material on the free-list and the annual tax reduction will not equal the sum of this year's surplus by $10,000,000.

It would but slightly exceed the reduction advised by the Secretary of the Treasury. Are we prepared to adopt either of these methods of reduction? Take off the duties horizontally and the revenues will most likely be increased, and we put in peril, if we do not wholly bankrupt, every industry now under the fostering care of the Government. On the other hand, what will happen if the dozen manufactures I have named are taken from the dutiable and put on the free list? There were employed in these industries eight years ago over 800,000 persons, and it is safe to assume that there are 1,000,000 so employed to-day.

If each employé supports two others—and that is a low estimate—there are 3,000,000 persons now dependent on these industries for support. In 1880 there were, as was recently stated by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN], 35,529 establishments in the United States of the character mentioned, paying out $268,000,000 annually in wages, and turning out annually over $1,400,000,000 worth of manufactured articles.

There is to-day more than $1,000,000,000 American capital invested in these industries, and the wage-workers receive more than $300,000,000 from them in wages each year. Suppose the removal of the protection the present tariff affords these industries will not wholly destroy them, will it not embarrass them, discourage further investments in them, compel a readjustment of industrial capital, and narrow the field and lessen the demand for labor? Is there any reason why this wound should be given the capital employed in these important enterprises?

There is no such peril as will excuse an injury to either capital or labor. The one can not exist without the other, and the prosperity of the one enhances that of the other. Capital is labor saved, and the greater the amount of labor the larger the sum of wealth and the means of enjoyment.

If you increase capital you instantly increase the means of supporting and employing additional laborers, and if you decrease capital you instantly take away a portion of the comforts and enjoyments, and perhaps, also, the necessaries of the productive classes.

To reduce existing tariff duties one-half, or one-third, on the revenue-reform plan, would, to say the least, unnecessarily put in peril our whole industrial fabric. It would result in increased importations, in the increase of foreign indebtedness, and an increased outflow of our coin to meet our obligations abroad.

It has been my purpose in what I have said to point out what I conceive to be the dangers of this tariff-reform policy as the President would have it, and of which policy the pending bill is a part. That the Democratic majority have not gone the whole length of the President's suggestion is because probably they fear party rather than financial disaster. Why has internal-revenue taxation been reduced $24,000,000 in the presence of the assurance that no just complaint could be made of these taxes? Why was tobacco relieved of taxation in the sum of $18,000,000 after the President had admonished his party that there was nothing so well able as it to bear the burden of taxation without hardship? Why is it that one entire third of the proposed tax reduction is to be made from internal taxes in defiance of the President's recommendation to the contrary? Evil-minded persons have suggested that this sudden change of policy was made to avert a Democratic strike in Virginia and other Democratic sections of the South.

But what of the bill now in committee? In reporting it the majority have said that the President's plan of reduction by taking its whole sum from duties on imports is, at least in the present political situation, unwise and illogical. In just so far as the bill differs from the President's recommendations it may find favor in this House. I assert the truth to be that if the body of the tobacco industry had been in the Republican Northwest it would not have been taken off the tax-lists. But for the whisky ring and the Democratic anxiety to strike protection a blow, whisky might have taken a place in this bill beside tobacco. To-day there is a large body of Democrats in the country, notwithstanding the President's position, who believe the whole internal-revenue system should be abolished.

If gentlemen believe the Democratic party is united in favor of the retention of the whisky tax, they are mistaken. Distinguished statesmen and journalists of the party are to-day making battle for the removal of this tax and all other direct war taxes.

I would not be misunderstood. The law that continues the tax on tobacco and intoxicating liquors has been acceptable to the people I have the honor to represent. They accept it because they have little respect for these manufactures—because they regard them as luxuries or worse. They believe moreover that the consumption of liquors imposes grievous burdens on the people and the State which the business should be compelled to bear. On these points I am in accord with my constituency.

However, there are distilled spirits used in the arts, and these are made to contribute about $6,000,000 annually to the Treasury. As this use is in no sense criminal, but is an aid of manufactures, there is no reason why the tax on spirits so employed should be continued. There can certainly be no objection to the removal of the whisky tax to this extent. It may happen that I will vote for the repeal of so much of internal taxation as is provided for in this bill.

While, after the amendments suggested, I would continue these taxes, I am not unmindful that, for strong reasons, there is a feeling rapidly developing in all sections of the country favorable to the total extirpation of internal-revenue taxation. There is to-day an active, aggressive, and enlightened moral sentiment demanding it. Looking at the system from a purely revenue standpoint it has much to condemn it and make it obnoxious to a free people. Its methods are tyrannical and inquisitorial. It maintains a swarm of tax-gatherers, spies, and informers, and no domicile is safe from invasion. It is a tax on production, and so maintained that the whisky interest has built up the monster monopoly of the world. But, worse than this, it tempts the commission of frauds and perjuries, and its enforcement incites violence and murder. Within the past eight years ten revenue officers have been killed outright and twenty others seriously wounded, and to-day in more than one State the ministers of the law go forward in its execution armed with revolvers and Springfield rifles. In view of these facts and the additional fact that these manufactures may be handed over to the States where the business is carried on for taxation, it is not surprising that there is a growing sentiment that the Government free itself from the whole business. Let it be understood that the whisky tax is to be maintained that the duties on imports may be abolished, or so reduced as to endanger our system of protection, and the whisky tax will have to go. I do not believe it is necessary to do either, but if I must choose I will not hesitate to save our industries, if needs be by the abolition of every internal tax.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I come to consider more directly the measure before us.

The bill assumes a tax reduction of $78,176,054. Of this sum $31,530,941 is obtained, as the figures show, by a scaling down of the dutiable schedules. This process reduces the rates, but often fails to reduce the revenues; and if our experience in tariff legislation is worth anything, it has taught us that scaling the duties, as proposed here, promotes importations and ultimately increases the collections. It was estimated that the act of March 3, 1883, would make a reduction from the dutiable list of over $19,000,000, but within three years increased importations not only brought our revenues up to the point they were at when the act passed, but some millions above it. If a tax reduction is to be made it should be a certain one, and ought not to be less than $80,000,000. If this bill should become a law it will not, in my opinion, reduce the surplus by more than $46,500,000, or a sum equal to the free-list added to the repealed tobacco and special license taxes.

But, Mr. Chairman, this bill proposes to reduce taxation by most objectionable methods. By a stroke of the pen, wool, one of the most valuable of farm products, is transferred from the dutiable to the free list and the duties on woolen manufactures reduced on the average one-half, or from 68 to 39 per cent. Why make wool free and maintain a protective duty on sugar and rice? Are these not food products, necessary alike for the rich and the poor? Should not the people have cheap food as well as cheap clothing? These are treated by this bill with a tenderness at once commendable and suspicious. Are not coal and iron ores as nearly raw material as wool? What reason can be given for putting wool on the free-list that does not apply with equal force to coal and iron ore?

Why this discrimination against wool? Do sugar, rice, iron ores, or coal have greater claims to the fostering care of protective duties than it? If these articles were wholly relieved from duty would it not, in the language of the President—directly lessen the cost of living in every family in the land, and release to the people in every humble home a larger measure of the rewards of frugal industry?

I put these questions that the promoters and advocates of this measure may answer.

What does this attack on wool mean? Are our markets to be thrown open to the wools of the world, and must the American farmer hereafter compete with the wool-raisers of India, South Africa, the Argentine Republic, Russia, and Australia? Sir, the annual wool-clip of these countries is over 1,000,000,000 pounds, and of these about 700,000,000 pounds are the product of the River Plate country in South America, the South African colonies, and Australia, where sheep are raised almost without cost of pasturage or labor. No one can doubt the disastrous consequences of such a competition. This industry is of too much importance to our people to be either sacrificed or put in jeopardy. Let us see the extent of the capital and the labor employed in it.

For the year 1884 official statistics show:

Number of sheep in the United States	50,626,620
Pounds of wool-clip	308,000,000
Value	$91,168,000
Pounds of raw wool imported	87,760,132
Value	$13,363,220
Value of manufactures of wool imported	51,484,872

The statistics of 1880, as to domestic woolen manufactures, show:

Number of establishments	2,689
Capital invested	$150,091,859
Hands employed	161,557
Wages paid	$47,389,067
Value of product	267,292,913
Cost of material used	164,371,551
Value of sheep	119,902,709

These statistics do not include the value of lands, barns, sheds, and implements employed in sheep-raising, which is estimated at $408,000,000.

Sir, more than 1,000,000, or nearly one-twelfth of the voters of the United States are flock-owners, and the wool product is more valuable than pig-iron and than the combined output of our gold and silver mines. It exceeds in value our unmanufactured tobacco by $34,000,000, is of one-half the value of our coal mines, while woolen manufactures exceed in value those of cottons by more than $50,000,000.

And wool raising, sir, is an agricultural industry—not a sectional but a national interest—for the sheep flock is found on almost every farm in the great States of Texas, California, Ohio, Michigan, Oregon, Kansas, Colorado, Nebraska, Indiana, and Illinois, and the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona, and sheep culture may be made profitable in all the States of the South. And the manufacture of wool is among the largest of our industries, and particularly in Vermont, New Jersey, Maine, New Hampshire, New York, Rhode Island, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Pennsylvania, and Ohio.

That this industry is not local is shown by apportioning the wool-clip among the several sections of the Union. In 1886 it was distributed as follows:

	Pounds.
Iowa, Missouri, Minnesota, and States east of the Mississippi, except the lower Southern, give a clip of	160,000,000
California	40,000,000
Oregon and other Western States	56,000,000
Colorado and New Mexico	24,000,000
Texas	26,000,000
Georgia and lower Southern	16,000,000

Again, this industry is capable of an almost indefinite growth, and there is no reason why wool and woolens should not be produced here in quantities equal to our home demand. In 1810 there were 10,000,000 sheep in the United States, and these numbers were increased only 100 per cent., or to 22,400,000, in fifty years. But a marvelous development began in 1869 and continued until it was arrested by the depressing effect of the lower tariff duties of the act of 1883. It is interesting to note the growth of this industry under our protective policy. In 1870 we had 28,477,951 sheep, and a wool-clip of 100,102,387 pounds; in 1880, 40,765,900 sheep, and a wool-clip of 240,000,000 pounds, and in 1884, when the lower duties took effect, 50,626,620 sheep, and a clip of 308,000,000 pounds. There was a corresponding increase in the number of establishments for the manufacture of woolens, in the capital invested, wages paid, and the number of persons employed. In 1870 there were 1,263 factories, with a capital of $30,932,000, giving employment to 43,738 people, and paying $10,153,000 in wages, but in 1880 factories had increased to 2,689, capital to $267,653,000, the number of employés to 161,000, and the sum paid out as wages to $47,389,000.

A prosperity like this would have given the country wool in abundance for every manufacture and every home demand. Last year we paid out for raw wools and woolen manufactures to the foreign wool-growers and foreign factory-owners $60,586,614, and this sum and more that ought to go to our own farmers, factory operatives, and capitalists will continue to leave us annually unless we arrest the outflow by fostering this industry until it is able to supply our markets. We can do this and keep these millions at home. Will we do it?

Hon. George L. Converse, a Democrat, formerly a Representative of Ohio, in a recent address in this city, speaking of this industry, said:

The production at home of wool and woolens, in quantities sufficient to supply the wants of the American people, is necessary for our defense in war, and our independence and comfort in time of peace. Successful military campaigns can not be carried on without woolen clothes for the soldiers. More soldiers die from exposure than are killed in battle. Neither of these great industries, once destroyed, can be again restored within a short time. Their restoration would require many years, and the men who by legislation would knowingly destroy them here and remit them to the keeping of foreign nations can not be classed among the friends of the Union.

This distinguished Democrat proceeds to give a very emphatic opinion of the "noisy sentiment of free trade." It affords me pleasure to quote it, as it will doubtless give the free-trade Democrat pleasure to hear it.

The noisy sentiment of "free trade," which is contrary to the settled policy of the Republic from its formation, or a "tariff for revenue only," excluding therefrom the principle of protection, which means, in effect, free trade, is nothing more nor less than a tradition of a cheap-labor system, which has been extinct for a quarter of a century. The intelligent, free-citizen laborers of America will never consent to be brought into such competition with the cheap, ill-fed, pauper labor of Europe, which is kept in subjection by the bayonet. That free trade, cheap-labor sentiment, like the distant mutterings of a retreating storm, will soon be hushed forever.

This is the pure Jeffersonian and Jacksonian Democracy, somewhat off-color now, but I indorse it.

What will be the effect of withdrawing all protection from wool? To me this is not a difficult problem. The wool interest has grown out of weakness into strength under protection. For fifty years it struggled for a foothold, and in all these years it but doubled its product. In twenty years, under the stimulus of a protective tariff, our national sheep flock increased from 22,000,000 to over 50,000,000, and the raw wools from 100,000,000 to over 300,000,000 pounds. An increase at this ratio for twenty years more and our own clip would have equaled our demand. But, sir, in 1883 we reduced the tariff on imported wools, and the world knows what happened. In three years 5,867,312 sheep disappeared from our flocks and 43,000,000 pounds of wools from our markets. If this marked decrease is not the result of our discouraging tariff legislation, to what is it attributable? It is certain that under free trade this industry languished—that under protection it has had a large and steady increase. It is true, also, indisputably true, that when our tariff duties were reduced there was a notable shrinkage in sheep and in wool and an increase in wool and woolen importations. In this we have but repeated the sad experience of Ireland. I will let the Irish World tell the story:

A brief recital of historical facts is here in order. Previous to the so-called "Union" Ireland possessed among other protected industries manufactures of wool, carpets, blankets, silk, linen, calico, flannels, stockings, etc. Of all those only one, linen, remains vigorous. Started nearly two centuries ago and nurtured by liberal protection, when in 1825 such protection was withdrawn it was sufficiently matured to stand strong and vigorous, and is now not only recognized as one of the leading industries of Europe, but so cosmopolitan in reputation that the prefix of Irish is a sure guaranty of excellence of fabric throughout the world. Not so with wool and its manufactures, an industry which from the birth of the lamb to the finished fabric of the loom gave pleasant and profitable employment to farmers, manufacturers, and operatives, besides, from a mysterious virtue in the excrements of the sheep, restoring worn-out lands and fertilizing hillsides where other agencies could not be applied.

The Union continued the protection on woolens twenty years, when by a sliding scale the import duties were gradually diminished to nothing, and in 1840 the woolen manufacturers of Dublin, who numbered 91 in the year 1800, were dwindled down to 12 in 1840, and the employés in the same time were numerically reduced from 4,918 to 602 persons. The same statistics show the decadence in Dublin thus: Master wool-combers in 1800, 39; in 1834, 5; operative wool-combers in 1800, 230; in 1834, 66; carpet manufacturers in 1800, 13; in 1841, 1; carpet operatives in 1800, 720; in 1841, 10. There were 1,000 flannel looms in the county of Wicklow in 1800. In 1841 not one remained. Similar results in many other industries could be presented did space permit.

But, Mr. Chairman, we are told that we need above all things to capture the foreign markets for our manufactures of wools; that to get these markets we must produce these goods more cheaply than they can be furnished by any other manufacturing nation. This means that the cheapest possible labor and material must be employed in these manufactures, for these are the chief elements of their cost. Can we afford to obtain these markets at such a cost? In the struggle this policy invites with the cheap wools of South Africa, South America, and Australia, and the cheap wages of Austria, Belgium, France, Germany, and Great Britain, we may not only fail to secure this wider market, but lose our own. And what are the markets of the world, and how do they compare in value and extent with our own? The five countries exporting woolen goods with the value of their exports last year are as follows:

Austria-Hungary	$10,935,541
Belgium	15,781,328
France	71,702,919
Germany	51,701,216
England	113,048,557
Total	262,769,561

Of the above the United States bought $45,000,000. Deduct this, and there is left of the world's market $217,000,000, while our own market is worth annually quite $300,000,000. Our home market is worth more, by nearly one-third, than the entire "world's markets, if we could capture them all."

Protection has made our market for wool and woolens one-third larger than that of the markets of all the other countries combined. Wisdom suggests that we strengthen and widen this American market until it becomes in fact the best market of the world.

After wool—an industry that concerns almost every State, and worth $90,000,000 annually—has been put on the free-list, is it not somewhat singular that sugar, the product of a single and limited section and worth less than $18,000,000, is to be protected by a yearly tax of $45,000,000, taken from the resources of all our people? Sugar is principally a production of Louisiana, although Florida and Texas make it in limited quantities. I am speaking now of sugars manufactured for our market. Even in Louisiana sugar raising is not the leading agricultural industry, for last year in an aggregate of $61,102,584, it was put at $14,831,936 only. These figures are furnished by the American, a publication of that State, and from which I quote:

During the past agricultural year, ending with December, 1887, Louisiana produced the following crops, which bear evidence to the inexhaustible fertility of its soil:

Products.	Acreage.	Yield.	Value.
Cotton.....bales...	1,025,300	468,802	$21,115,150
Sugar.....barrels...	177,044	$1,060,424	14,831,936
Molasses.....gallons...		(16,243,490	4,548,977
Rice.....pounds..	72,686	61,930,831	3,046,888
Corn.....bushels...	973,142	19,927,323	10,963,364
Oats.....do.....	36,861	498,000	263,940
Potatoes, sweet.....do.....	19,462	1,895,622	812,297
Potatoes, Irish.....do.....	6,719	257,168	307,402
Hay.....tons...	28,200	71,200	1,078,000
Fruits.....	8,000	.....	360,000
Other agricultural products, forage, etc.....	10,000	.....	3,775,000
Total.....	2,357,414	.....	61,102,584

It will seen that Louisiana's cotton last year was worth $6,500,000 more than its sugar, and its corn only $3,500,000 less. This is the size of the sugar industry in a State better adapted by soil and climate than any other for its culture, after an experiment under the most favorable conditions for more than one hundred years. And this industry is not equal to-day to that of 1854—thirty-four years ago—by nearly 200,000,000 pounds, although twenty-two years have past since the close of the war. In 1861-'62 the sugar product was 528,321,000 pounds; last year it was less than 300,000,000. Our home product is not increasing, while our home consumption is at the rate of 10 per cent. each year. In 1878 we consumed 1,552,875,112 and in 1887 2,782,000,000 pounds, and in the mean time the annual sugar duty has increased from $36,387,464 to $56,507,495. In the year just past these duties have increased $6,341,957.

Mr. WILKINSON. Does the gentleman know that the duty on sugar now is 38½ per cent. less than the war duty, and that if this bill is passed the duty will be reduced more than 50 per cent. below the war duty?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Not 50 per cent.

Mr. WILKINSON. Yes; 50 per cent. The war duty from 1862 to 1870 was 3 cents per pound for the lowest grade up to 5 cents per pound for the highest grade—on an average, 4 cents per pound. Under the schedules of the Mills bill the average will be a little over 1.9 cents per pound.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I only know that with the revenue derived from the existing duty, in one year and a half I can buy and pay for the whole sugar interest of the United States—every bit of it—and have several millions left. I know that under the Mills bill we shall still pay tribute in the sum of $45,000,000 a year, to protect an insignificant product whose annual sum is less than $20,000,000.

Mr. WILKINSON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] yield?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I do not yield further now.

The American people consume about one-fourth the sugar crop of the world and only produce about 10 per cent. of that one-fourth.

I submit that our people can not afford to make these enormous yearly contributions because some enthusiasts hope that by so doing we may at some time and in some way stimulate and enlarge our sugar production. We are told that Texas and Louisiana and Florida have lands adapted to sugar culture capable of supplying sugar in amounts equal to our own demand and equal also to the wants of all the world. Why, then, does this industry stand still?

Mr. WILKINSON. It does not stand still.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. It does not exactly stand still. You produce more sugar in Louisiana to-day than you did when all your sugar-producing people left and went into the army. I admit that; but as I said some time ago, after you have had twenty-two years of peace, you have not reached by 200,000,000 pounds the annual product of a year or two before the beginning of the war.

Mr. WILKINSON. The crop last year was more than the crop in 1860. I have the figures to show it.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Well, I have the figures of Mr. Henry A. Brown, an ex-Treasury expert, who has made these calculations in the interest of maintaining a protective duty on sugar. I am not responsible for his figures, nor for the figures the gentleman refers to. I find that figures are a very convenient thing. We make them in tariff discussions to supply the home demand. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLAND. Would it interrupt the gentleman——

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Why, the gentleman never interrupts me. He sometimes votes wrongly, and disturbs me in that way.

Mr. BLAND. Do not the figures show that the tax on sugar is a revenue tax, which goes into the Treasury, not into the pockets of the manufacturer? The tax does not go into private coffers, but into the Treasury of the Government.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I am coming to that in a few minutes. I have heard that suggestion before.

Mr. BLAND. That is what I am in favor of—a tax that goes into the Federal Treasury—not into the pockets of private individuals.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I will show presently that it is a favorite theory of the Democracy to relieve from taxation these necessaries that go into the consumption of all the families of the people. Yet you gentlemen continue to tax the sugar of the poor and the rich alike; and it never yet occurred to you that you ought to return to the dutiable list tea and coffee, all the revenue upon which would go into the Treasury and none to any tea or coffee raiser in the United States. The trouble is, my friend, that sugar grows in Louisiana and Texas, while coffee and tea do not. Sugar votes the Democratic ticket; coffee and tea can not. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. WILKINSON. Do the sugar producers of Kansas vote the Democratic ticket?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. No, sir; in the providence of God they are not influenced by any such consideration.

Mr. FUNSTON. They read the newspapers, and of course they do not vote the Democratic ticket.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I will talk about Kansas presently.

How much protection must we give to start it on the highway of prosperity? We could buy, sir, the whole sugar crop of these States three times over every year with the money we pay out in duties and have some millions to spare. And the fact that these States are engaged in this business to a limited extent only proves that it is either not profitable or some other industry is more so. We have since the tariff act of 1861 paid out in sugar duties well-nigh, if not quite, $1,000,000,000, and still the industry languishes.

Mr. WILKINSON. I hope that the gentleman will not continue to ignore the facts in regard to the sugar industry.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. If gentlemen continue to interrupt me I shall not finish this speech until Christmas; and I know you will quit when I make that threat.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana declines to yield for interruptions.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. No, sir; I do not want to put it in that way. I simply hope, in tender mercy to my audience, that my time will not be occupied by interruptions, as my speech is, at any rate, very long.

How much longer must we foster this business by these unparalleled expenditures? Our sugar duties in the last ten years equal one-third of our national debt. Here let me give the official figures of these ten years, covering our imports for consumption and the duties paid:

Year.	Consumed, pounds.	Value.	Duty paid.
1878	1,552,875,112	$78,986,070	$36,387,464
1879	1,598,461,986	65,918,931	37,294,197
1880	1,592,261,958	67,015,831	39,107,256
1881	1,869,173,808	82,721,087	45,933,045
1882	1,913,396,455	84,355,545	46,711,795
1883	1,931,610,911	81,327,942	44,517,851
1884	2,437,570,913	88,044,316	47,500,750
1885	2,578,993,335	69,078,857	50,885,916
1886	2,509,287,699	71,311,090	50,265,538
1887	2,781,159,646	68,882,884	56,507,495

In ten years, as here shown, we have paid $455,111,307 in duties, and during this period the whole sugar product has not been worth one-third that sum.

This is not all. Since the Hawaiian treaty we have imported 1,166,350,000 pounds of reciprocity sugars that have not paid a penny into the Treasury, but when sold in our markets the duty has been added to the price and paid by the consumers. Here again the people have been taxed, without any resulting benefit, in eleven years in an additional sum of over $32,000,000. The sum of the duty is added not only to our home sugars but to these reciprocity sugars and the whole sum is paid by the consumer, for these being only 10 per cent. of our consumption, do not furnish such competition as to reduce, in any measure, the price. For one, I am not willing to longer burden the people with this tax—to longer levy, by this method, a tribute on every table in the land to protect this limited and sectional industry.

As a revenue measure this feature of this bill is most objectionable. Sugar is a necessary food product and goes into the consumption of every family. The poor and the rich alike use it. We ought not to resort to the little incomes of the poor for revenue when there are objects able to bear the burdens of taxation without being oppressive to any.

Mr. Chairman, this is a bill to reduce not to increase revenues. This at least is its avowed object—for this purpose it was ordained and for this reason we are asked to pass it. If it makes a reduction here it will be but a temporary one at best. Sugar importations are increasing so rapidly that in a year or two our revenues from this source will be back to what they are now. As a measure of reduction this is a fraud and a sham. It would not reduce at this point. Why not make a genuine reduction here rather than in the tobacco tax. Tobacco, one of the meanest of luxuries, is made practically free, while sugar, a common and universal necessary of the people, gets but little if any exemption from taxation. A proposition more unjust and absurd has seldom, in my opinion, been submitted in a revenue bill.

Sir, the revenues derived from sugar last year were equal to the capital employed in that industry in Louisiana, and with these revenues for two years the Government can buy and pay for the whole sugar business in the United States, capital, product, and all. Louisiana has, according to the highest estimate, but $60,000,000 invested, and the whole country not to exceed $80,000,000; and our sugar duties for two years, on the basis of last year's collections, would be $113,014,990. This is high-priced protection.

But, Mr. Chairman, we are informed that this duty is to be maintained for revenue only, and the Democratic party, in the ascendency in the sugar section, indorse the President's policy and send representatives to this House to vote wool and every other agricultural product, save their own, to the tender mercies of free trade. That these gentlemen vote their convictions I do not doubt, but that they will cheerfully accept the logical result of their votes and teachings I am disposed to question. If sugar must be protected for revenue—for the unvarnished truth is that this duty is to be continued to protect the sugar interest—why not continue a wool duty for revenue? How much less burdensome is it to pay from $45,000,000 to $50,000,000 annually on sugar than pay one-seventh that sum on wool? That Democratic logic that taxes whisky for revenue, because it is not a necessity but a harmful luxury, and then proceeds to tax sugar for revenue, because it is not a luxury but an innocent and universal necessity of the people, is at least unique.

The sugar output of Louisiana and Texas and Florida is to be supplemented, we are told, by the beet sugars of California and the sorghum sugars of Kansas and other Western States, and that with proper encouragement this industry will soon develop a product more than sufficient to supply our home market. This is an unsolved problem. For a quarter of a century our experiments in sorghum and beet-sugar production have been failures. Just now Kansas gives promise of success in the one and California in the other. How much sorghum sugar Kansas has supplied our markets I have no means for knowing, but the Alvarado Company, in California, has, during the nine years of its existence, produced about 1,000,000 pounds of beet sugar per annum. Successful as this experiment seems to be, I am not aware that a single other similar enterprise exists in the country to-day. Why is this the case if the business is profitable?

No one more sincerely hopes success to our sugar industry than myself. I desire that America may supply every American want, and to that end I am ready and anxious to vote encouragement, by every reasonable and just measure, to every home industry. I would encourage and stimulate the sugar industry in all the States by giving certain and suitable protection. Weak as it is in the United States, I would not, if it could be avoided, abandon it to the destructive competition of Cuba, Java, Brazil, Germany, and the other great sugar countries of the world.

This question is now before us and we can not escape it, how long will the people consent to pay this tax—still to be $50,000,000 a year—to save from annihilation, if you please, an annual product worth less than one-half that sum? There are already signs of revolt. If we would save this industry we must reduce this monstrous taxation and adopt a method of protection less costly, while at the same time it is more certain in its results.

Right here a little history will be both appropriate and valuable. Sugar-cane was first planted in Louisiana in 1727, or one hundred and sixty-one years ago. The first sugar-mill was erected in 1751; excellent sugar was marketed in New Orleans in the last century, and sixty years ago the sugar product had reached an annual output of 30,000 hogsheads. To-day, after all these long years of experiment and protection, the aggregate annual sugar product is less than 300,000,000 pounds. Long since sugar-cane was introduced into the United States, France, Germany, Russia, Austria, Belgium, Holland, and other nations of Europe have commenced the manufacture of sugar from the beet. This manufacture has, in every instance, been developed under a system of bounties paid directly to the producer. The results have been magical. To-day the sugar of the beet exceeds that of the cane by 500,000 tons per annum. The success of these bounty laws in promoting this industry is phenomenal. I quote from Henry A. Brown, an ex-special agent of the Treasury, who, I take it, favors the continuance of the present tariff. He says:

Encouraged by bounties, France produced 4,000 tons of beet sugar in 1830, 23,000 tons in 1840, 62,000 tons in 1850, 126,500 tons in 1860, 282,000 tons in 1870, 33,614 tons in 1880, and 488,300 tons in 1886; Germany produced 346,646 tons of beet sugars in 1875, 594,223 tons in 1880, 986,493 tons in 1883, 1,154,817 tons in 1884, 967,962 tons in 1886. Similar progress has been made in other European countries. The total European beet-sugar crop was, in 1867, 633,000 tons; in 1880, 1,774,545 tons; in 1883, 2,360,314 tons; in 1884, 2,545,889 tons, and 2,625,442 tons in 1886.

Regarding continental rebates on exports of sugar English official reports to Parliament say: "The gist of the matter, as regards the action of the foreign governments referred to, is, that the majority of the people and legislatures think that the benefits which, in their opinion, accrue to the agricultural, industrial, and shipping interests of the country by the development of the sugar industry more than counterbalance any injury from the bounties granted." The same statements were repeated, in substance, in 1886–'87.

When M. Thiers was urged by English emissaries, in 1874–'75, to abolish French sugar bounties, he replied, "Never; never will I grant you that, as it is the French industries you wish to destroy and the English industries you ask me to protect."

* * * * * * *

France pays 2 cents per pound bounty on sugar exports (see elsewhere), and virtually prohibits imports of sugar. Germany (see elsewhere) pays bounty on exports of sugar from 32 cents to about 63 cents per 100 pounds, according to grades, and virtually prohibits the importation of sugar. Germany and France alone produce enough beet sugar to supply the annual consumption of imported sugars in the United States.

Why not pay a bounty? This will give a protection more direct and certain than tariff duties. It will be good economy, for a bounty will cost less than one-fifth of the present tax. It will relieve us from the payment of at least $35,000,000 every year, even though the duty be reduced as contemplated by this bill. If it be objected that Congress may repeal the bounty, I answer that protective legislation is equally subject to this danger. The people will not complain of legislation that gives ample encouragement to a home industry and at the same time relieves them from the payment of millions of annual taxes.

By the bounty method this industry has been built up to large proportions in all the leading nations of Europe, and they are so satisfied with its results that after fifty years of trial there is no demand for its repeal.

But, sir, I would raise the revenues necessary for the payment of these bounties from duties imposed on imported sugars. If the people are satisfied with the present duties, would they not be content to pay less? I would tax sugar just so much as may be necessary to pay the bounty, and no more. In this way we can stimulate and enlarge our home production, if increase be possible; and if some such method be not adopted a long-suffering people will demand that sugar be put with tea and coffee unconditionally on the free-list.

Leaving the people subject to a sugar tax of more than 75 cents per capita, this bill proceeds to demolish the salt duty of only 1½ cents, and the lumber duty of less than 2 cents per capita. How inconsistent and illogical! And this is a measure to reduce the burdens of taxation! In a wisely adjusted measure I would not be averse to putting lumber and salt on the free-list. However, while this will insure a reduction of the surplus by $1,750,000, or about that sum, I doubt, seriously doubt, whether it will bring any relief to the consumer. It may happen, indeed it is likely to happen, that the Canadian lumberman will wholly escape the payment of duty, and command for his commodity in our American markets the prices already established. He alone may be benefited. Should this be the result we will lose something over $1,000,000 by the experiment.

And how about salt? Imported salt pays the insignificant duty of 8 and 12 cents on each 100 pounds. The duty on a ton of salt such as our farmers use is only $1.60. In the Saginaw Valley to-day a barrel of good salt—the barrel included—can be bought for 58 cents. Salt was never cheaper than now. I can buy this day, at my Indiana home, salt for less than it cost to carry it from the wholesale dealer to that place on the day it was first made subject to a protective duty.

How unkind this bill is to our Northwestern farmers, and especially to those on the Canadian border. It puts a long line of fruits, vegetables, and other products of the soil on the free-list, and as to these gives the Canadian farmer unrestricted access to the American markets. But like products of the American farmer crossing the border are subject to a duty imposed by the Dominion Government. This bill abolishes direct protection on nineteen farm products and materially impairs protection on three others. The Canadian people should be profoundly grateful.

I notice in the press reports that a few days ago Sir Charles Tupper, minister of finance, in a speech in the Dominion House of Commons, declared his belief that the Democratic party would continue to possess the confidence of the people of the United States, and that the result of the fishery treaty would be the enlargement of our trade relations with Canada; and in support of this he cited the fact that "the ink had hardly dried on that treaty before a bill was introduced by the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee placing on the free-list five articles of Canadian production upon which last year no less than $1,800,000 had been paid in duties." Our farming people will earnestly protest against the enlargement of our trade relations upon terms so destructive to their industry.

I do not care to discuss further the details of this incongruous and illogical measure. A tariff revision so destructive, so inequitable, so inconsistent and sectional as this will not be acceptable to the people, and it will not, I am sure, become a law.

At no time have I opposed a revision of our revenue system. Human wisdom has never devised statutes of taxation nor methods for industrial encouragement so perfect as not to be subject to just criticism. I believe the tariff ought to be revised, and if it were possible I would now take up this legislation, line by line, and amend it wherever amendment is necessary for the general welfare. Wherever a duty is too high I would reduce it; wherever too low, increase it. In making changes I would keep constantly in view the interest of the whole people, not that of a mere section. In adjusting taxation I would tax the lightest the necessaries of life and put the heaviest burdens upon luxuries. No legitimate industry should be harmed and none put in peril.

Our revenue laws are the creatures of the Republican party, fashioned by that party, when to avert the greatest of national calamities, the destruction of the Union, immense revenues were required. It made them, it has repeatedly amended them, and is ready to do so again. In 1883 it amended the whole revenue system, and within a period of less than twenty years reduced internal-revenue taxation from $309,266,000 to $116,000,000. Changes in trade, in commercial and economic conditions, render frequent modification and amendment necessary. In no important particular has these laws been modified save by the Republican party, and that party stands pledged to-day, when the question is committed to it, to correct their inequalities and to revise them, always having regard to the interest of the tax-payer, the laborer, and the productive interests of the country. It believes in protection, but believes also in fair and equitable taxation, and in tax reduction whenever and wherever it can be made without injury. I quote:

No great system of revenue like our tariff can operate with efficiency and equity unless the changes of trade be closely watched and the law promptly adapted to those changes. But I would make no changes that should impair the protective character of the whole body of the tariff laws.—James G. Blaine.

The Republican party pledges itself to correct the inequalities of the tariff, and to reduce the surplus, not by the vicious and indiscriminate process of horizontal reduction, but by such methods as will relieve the taxpayer without injuring the laborer or the great productive interests of the country.—Republican National platform, 1884.

The Government should be administered with the strictest economy consistent with the public safety and interest. Revenue should be so laid as to give the greatest possible exemption to articles of primary necessity and fall most heavily upon luxuries.—Indiana Republican platform, 1868.

In 1870 the Indiana Republicans said:

A reduction of taxation is demanded, both of tariff and internal taxes, until it reaches the lowest amount consistent with the credit and necessities of the Government; and we are in favor of a tariff for revenue, believing that a proper adjustment of duties must necessarily afford all the incidental protection to which any interest is entitled,

In 1876 they said:

It is the duty of the Government in passing laws for raising revenue so to levy taxes as to give the greatest possible exemption to articles of primary necessity, and to place them most heavily upon luxuries and the wealth of the country.

In 1882 they said:

A revenue greatly reduced in amount being all that is needed to pay the interest on our public debt and the expenses of the Government economically administered, the time has arrived for such a reduction of taxes and regulation of tariff duties as shall raise no more money than shall be necessary to pay such interest and expenses. We therefore approve the efforts now making to adjust this reduction so that no unnecessary burdens upon the consumers of imported articles exist, and no injuries be inflicted upon our domestic industries or upon the industrial classes employed therein.

We favor an early and judicious revision of the tariff, with a simplification and reduction of customs duties.—Platform of last State Republican convention in Minnesota.

We believe the tariff should be revised and reduced.—Platform of last Republican State convention in Iowa.

As the business of the country now demands a revision of the tariff, the Republican party, alive to the demands of every material interest, will see to it that such revision shall be made at the earliest practicable day.—Platform of the last Republican State convention in Nebraska.

And this is the last utterance of the Indiana Republicans on this question:

We favor the reduction and readjustment of the tariff from time to time, as circumstances may require. * * * In our opinion the duties should be reduced as low as will be allowed by a wise observance of the necessity to protect that portion of our manufactures and labor whose prosperity is essential to our national safety and independence.

These platforms voice the Republican policy. They favor readjustment and amendment by reducing duties as low as the necessity for adequate protection will allow. To this doctrine I subscribe without reservation. But, sir, this policy is powerless in a tribunal where it finds no sympathy with the majority. Here a genuine tariff reform is not possible, and here, I regret to say, protection can perhaps do no better than defend itself from the assaults of its foes.

The President is to be congratulated that he has at last compelled his party to tender an issue on the tariff question. His adherents can no longer beguile the industrial classes by such seductive phrases as—

Tax reduction must be so made as not to injure any domestic industry, and the tariff must be revised without depriving American labor of the ability to compete with foreign labor.

The masquerade is over. The party now fights under its true colors.

The question of to-day and the question of the future is, Shall our revenue system be that of free trade or protection? This bill is the vanguard of a free-trade policy. I am more concerned about the fate of this issue than of this bill.

The President and his free-trade supporters attack protection as vicious and illogical, and assume, first, that the sum of the duty on the imported article is added to its price, that it raises the price by precisely the sum of the duty and is paid by the consumer; second, that the duty on imported articles not only raises their price to the extent of the duty paid, but has the same effect and raises the price to the same extent on all domestic manufactures of the same kind; third, that protective legislation does not increase the wages of labor except as to those who are employed in the factory and the mine, and that whatever of increased pay it secures them is at the expense of the wage-workers in other employments; that in fact the employé of the mine or the factory is not benefited, for while it increases his wages it at the same time robs him of a larger sum by compelling him to pay an increased price for everything he consumes.

The central thought here is that a tariff is a tax, that it is added to the article and paid by the consumer without any returning benefit, that the consumer pays this tax for the benefit of the producer, and that this is inequitable.

Sir, this is too narrow a statement of the proposition. It avoids the main issue in this contention. The question is not whether the duty is added to the price, but whether the article in our market actually costs the consumer more than he would have paid had no protection been given to the American competing industry. In other words, has protection, tested by its results, increased the price of the protected article? This problem is not to be solved by the "dry husks of theory," but by living facts furnished by our experience. It is within our knowledge, it is undisputed history, that every protected article made by our people in quantities approximating our home demand has gone steadily down under the fostering care of our protective policy.

I could demonstrate this by the statistics of a hundred industries, but a few notable examples must answer. Saginaw salt sold in 1866 for $1.80, and sells to-day for 58 cents per barrel. The currency price for a ton of steel rails in 1867 was $166; to-day it commands but $31.50, and has sold as low as $28. In 1875, when our plate-glass industry became a competitive one, plate-glass was worth 98 cents a foot, and now it sells at 33 cents. A large plate, then costing $105, can be bought to-day for $31.50. Pig-iron found its lowest level under a free-trade tariff at $31.18 per ton, while under protection it can be had at $18. Pottery has gone down one-half under protection. I need not particularize further. There has been during the past twenty years a steady cheapening of the factory product of cotton and woolen goods of all kinds of textiles, of shoes, of furniture, household goods, manufactures of steel and iron, of glass ware, of tools, and of machinery.

In the presence of these facts can the consumer say he has lost the sum of whatever duties he may have paid? Are not the articles he consumes, with the duty added, cheaper now than before they were taxed? Why is this so? Has not protection, by giving security to capital, stimulated American enterprise and developed an industrial competition until the American consumer has been given the best and cheapest market he ever had? Has not the building up of our home manufactures not only cheapened their product here, but reduced the prices of similar products abroad? Would free trade have given a cheaper market? Let him who thinks himself robbed by the tariff charge it with the sum of the duty paid and then credit it with his savings in diminished prices under its operation, and see how the account stands. He will find that the balance-sheet will show him largely and directly indebted to protection for its savings without counting the other benefits and compensations of the system.

Mr. O'NEALL, of Indiana. How does the gentleman justify the duty on copper.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I want the privilege of saying to my friend that if I had the opportunity I would put copper ore on the free-list so quickly that it would make his head swim.

We produce some manufactures here more cheaply than they are made abroad. Do these need protection? Perhaps not, but as the duty can do no possible harm, is there any occasion for repealing it? But Europe could, we are told, but for the duty, supply our markets with many articles more cheaply than we can produce them, and why should not the duty be taken off that the consumer may have the cheaper goods? But is it not true that our home products have been constantly cheapening; and if we continue our favorable conditions for labor and capital, may we not, with our unlimited resources, ultimately undersell the world? Would it be wise to change conditions that have wrought so great a prosperity?

But suppose we abolish tariff duties, and give Europe the unrestricted use of our markets, will we get cheaper goods? The very contrary will happen. Free trade is only safe between nations having equal industrial conditions. The nation possessing industrial advantages always destroys or seriously cripples the trade of its weaker and less fortunate rival. The purpose of a tariff is to equalize these conditions. Labor is the chief factor in the cost of production. A very large per cent. of the cost of every manufacture is the sum paid for labor. In the United States wages are higher—on an average quite 80 per cent. higher—than in Italy, Germany, Belgium, France, and England.

Labor is better rewarded here than in any country of the world. Low wages produce cheap goods. Between countries paying low and those paying high wages there can be no equal competition. If we withdraw our protective duties we surrender our markets to the products of the cheaper labor of Europe, for unless there is a reduction in the wages of labor the American manufacturer will be for the time undersold. When our home industries are paralyzed and domestic competition destroyed prices will go up. All experience teaches this lesson. What supreme folly it would be to try this experiment. That our laborers and our domestic industries needed tariff protection was plainly conceded by the Democratic national platform of 1884, for the reason that our higher wage-rate made the cost of production here greater than in those countries where labor is cheaper. I read from that platform:

> The necessary reduction can and must be effected without depriving American labor of the ability to compete successfully with foreign labor, and without imposing lower rates of duty than will be ample to cover any increased cost of production which may exist in consequence of the higher rate of wages prevailing in this country.

Let the Government maintain a rate of duties that will be ample to cover the increased cost of production and the wage-worker and the manufacturer will be safe. As a protectionist I have never demanded more than this.

I submit now the truth to be that protection has given the people cheaper goods than they would have had but for the industrial activities that it brought into being, and that the tariff does not, in fact, tax or oppress the consumer, but on the contrary is manifestly to his advantage.

If the propositions I have submitted are correct, the laborer in the mine and the factory is not robbed of his higher wages by the increased cost of consumption. To refute this charge we have but to contrast the condition of the laborer here with that of his fellow in Italy, Germany, Ireland, France, or Great Britain. I do not speak of the difference in his favor in kind of food, clothes, and shelter only, but I call attention to differences in his savings as shown by the sum of his deposits in savings institutions. How much greater the deposits of the wage-workers of Lowell than those of Manchester or Sheffield, of those of the United States than those of the most favored European nations. Look at the official figures of what our industrious and frugal working people are saving from their earnings. The Comptroller of the Currency reported that at the close of 1886 the number of depositors in the savings banks of the country was 2,158,950, the deposits averaging $361.36. These deposits aggregate a sum nearly equal to the national debt. This sum represents labor saved, and shows the immense possibilities opened up to our work people.

In 1887 the number of depositors had increased to 2,944,731, and the following tables show the amount of deposits and where made:

Number of depositors in savings-banks and amount on deposit.

The deposits in the nine manufacturing States are $1,033,279,827, and in all the States the sum is $1,143,700,000. These afford substantial evidence of the prosperity of these classes of the laboring people.

But is it true that protection only benefits a class of wage-workers? It benefits all classes. It diversifies our industrial pursuits, multiplies divisions and variety of manufacture, enlarges the demand for labor, and increases the wage rate. The factory finds employment for labor that would otherwise crowd into the shop of the mechanic or to the fields of the farmer. Close the factory and our other industries would be overdone. Destroy manufacturing employments and the consumers of the agricultural product would become its producers. Diminish the body of the consumers of the product of the mechanic and the farmer and increase the body of the producers, and both industries must suffer irreparable loss. Sir, it is absurd to say that a large body of laborers in a community can be prosperous without imparting some measure of that prosperity to the others. The wages of labor in one employment go to buy the product of a hundred other industries, and all are benefited.

Again, it is contended that in fact, considering the cost of living in Europe, the tariff does not increase the American wage rate—that the lower pay there will buy more of the necessaries of life than the higher pay in this country. It is said that if our workers get high wages the articles they consume are correspondingly dear, and therefore they can afford to accept free-trade conditions with low pay and a cheap living.

The fact is there is but a fraction of difference in the cost of livings of the same kind here and in England. But apply a true test to this question and what is the result? Take the cost of the necessary yearly supplies of a family of four persons in the United States and deduct this from the sum of the annual wages of the family, and find the balance. Apply the same rule to a like family in Italy, Germany, Belgium, France, and England? After the livings are deducted from the earnings, which, the American or the European family, has the larger sum of the year's wages left? This will tell whether labor here or abroad is the more profitable.

A careful compilation of the statistics furnished by our consular and other authentic reports recently furnished by Mr. J. H. Walker, of Massachusetts, show that the fair average difference in the cost of the yearly supplies of a family of four persons in Italy, Belgium, France, Germany, or England, and a like family in the United States is about $14, including tariff duties. These supplies include twenty-one different articles which enter into the consumption of the humblest American household. The wage-earning is computed on the basis of two workers—a man and woman, or a man and boy—to each family. The wage rate in each country is the other factor in the problem. What is the result?

This table shows that a laborer's family of four persons, with two workers, can not possibly save in Germany over $11.70; in Belgium, $4; in France, $57.90; in England, $123; in America, $534, in a whole year.

A weaver's family can save in Germany nothing; in Belgium, $70.50; in France, $144; in England, $284; in America, $584.

Take the highest paid workers, it shows that the possible savings of the family of a locomotive engineer, in Germany are $450.33; in Belgium, $438; in France, $516.40; in England, $432.40; in America, $1,334; and the possible savings of carpenters, blacksmiths, tinsmiths, etc., range between these extremes in each of the countries named.

Sir, there is not a people in Europe that does not know that American labor is better remunerated than any in the world. Our economic institutions, our industrial thrift, our steady prosperity, invite laborers to come to us from every civilized nation, and Europe alone sends to our shores from 300,000 to 500,000 of her people every year.

Again, it is a truth admitted by the economists that labor has its largest demand and commands the highest price where there is the greatest diversity of employments, and where all industrial pursuits are stimulated to their greatest activity.

Protection has given these conditions to our people. It has given labor here its best possible opportunity by opening the mine, building the shop, the factory, and putting every possible wheel, plow, hammer, spindle, and loom in motion. I close, sir, on this point by repeating that the supreme aim and effect of protective legislation is to assure industrial and national independence, to invite the investment of capital in productive enterprises, to develop every trade and pursuit, to create a large and certain home market for the product of the farm, the factory, and the mine, to give steady and remunerative employment to labor, and secure a competition that will make our home market the best in the world. It is

> This policy which inspires labor with hope and crowns it with dignity; which gives it safety and protects its increase; which secures political equality to every citizen, comfort and culture to every home.

Mr. Chairman, the farmers of the country are told by the free-trade propagandists that their industry is robbed by the tariff.

WHAT IS THE EFFECT OF PROTECTION ON THE AGRICULTURAL INDUSTRY?

In the past quarter of a century there has been a most rapid and gratifying growth of our agricultural industries, an unparalleled progress in farm improvements, a vast increase in farm acreage and in the value of farm lands.

The increase of farm products during these years is phenomenal, and in the marvelous prosperity of our country the farmer has had his fair share.

His industry in this era of wonderful development has kept well abreast of that of the mine, the workshop, and the manufactory, and he is to-day among the most independent of men. He is not only prosperous himself but takes an American's pride in the prosperity of his countrymen engaged in other employments. Notwithstanding this growth, this content, this prosperity, the free-trade revenue reformer insists that he is being systematically and remorselessly robbed by our protective system. It is recklessly asserted that this system has somehow or other so impoverished the farmers, especially of the great West, that a mortgage is, with its usurious interest, devouring almost every farm in that growing section. This is bald assertion, unsupported by fact.

There are farmers in debt, there are farms under mortgage, it is true, but this condition of debt is not peculiar to this class of our people. The same is true of the merchant, mechanic, and manufacturer. In a new and undeveloped country, as our Western country has been, there are always those without the means to pay for their farms and improve them, and that these have to borrow money and execute mortgages is a necessity which the tariff had nothing whatever to do in creating. The time never was when there were not to be found chronic alarmists, who predicted that protection would bring all sorts of ills and all manner of financial distress to the Western farmer. They will have him, regardless of facts, tax-ridden, the victim of the Shylocks, or of the banks, or tariffs, and just on the eve of a hopeless bankruptcy. Statistics with startling arrays of figures are drummed into the service to prove his pitiable condition, and that he is "languishing under a system of taxation unparalleled in the history of the world." Still the calamity so often foretold never comes, but is kindly postponed to do service in the next political campaign. The statement was made in this House but the other day, and a partisan press has given it a wide circulation, that the farm lands in the ten States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, Michigan, Minnesota, Iowa, Nebraska, Kansas, and Missouri are now under mortgage for the appalling aggregate of $3,422,000,000. The statement in detail is as follows:

Ohio	$700,000,000
Indiana	308,000,000
Illinois	620,000,000
Wisconsin	250,000,000
Michigan	250,000,000
Minnesota	175,000,000
Iowa	351,000,000
Nebraska	140,000,000
Kansas	200,000,000
Missouri	257,000,000
Total farm mortgages in the ten States	3,422,000,00

This sum is more than twice as large as the present national debt. But the above estimate was not sufficiently startling, and it has been supplemented by another, in which the Ohio farmers are said to be mortgaged for $1,270,000,000. Then follows those of Kansas for $235,000,000, of Illinois for $1,000,000,000, of Indiana for $635,000,000, of Iowa for $567,000,000, of Michigan for $500,000,000, and of Wisconsin for $367,000,000. To give these estimates plausibility it is asserted that they are taken from the records. I challenge their truthfulness. They are not only false, but absurd, and that they are so is easily demonstrated. The census of 1880 gives the total value of the real estate of Ohio at $1,093,000,000, and these preposterous statements assume that her farm lands alone are morigaged at from $700,000,000 to $1,270,000,000. Indiana's real estate is estimated by the census at $538,000,000, and it is said that her farms alone are encumbered from $308,000,000 to $635,000,000. But the condition of Illinois is still worse. Her farm mortgages are said to be equal to $620,000,000, while the value of her entire real estate, in farm and town, as given by the last census, is but $575,000,000. This great State has 27,000,000 acres of land, and if they are subject to this immense debt the mortgage charge is but a fraction less than $23 per acre.

The estimates as to the other States named are equally ridiculous; but the census gives the estimated value of all real estate, not that of farm lands only. Who so credulous as to believe that the farms of our most prosperous Western States are encumbered in a sum equal to the value of their entire real estate, including that of town and city, as found eight years ago by the census? The alarmists assume this to be true, and think, I suppose, the people know no better than to believe the falsehood.

But, sir, I have before me a journal, a Democratic journal, containing a statement said to have been carefully compiled from authentic sources, showing the amount of capital invested in farm mortgages in each of the thirty-eight States; and from this I find that the farm lands of Illinois are mortgaged for $200,000,000; Indiana, $175,000,000; Ohio, $350,000,000; Michigan, $125,000,000; Wisconsin, $100,000,000; Minnesota, $70,000,000; Iowa, $100,000,000; Missouri, $100,000,000; Nebraska, $25,000,000; Kansas, $50,000,000.

This reduces this farm-mortgage debt quite two-thirds, or from $3,422,000,000 to $1,295,000,000. It is certain that, whether intentionally or not, the amount of the farm-mortgage indebtedness has been scandalously magnified. That it was done for partisan purposes is undoubted. These statements probably exaggerate the sum of this indebtedness by hundreds of millions, for recently the commissioner of labor for Michigan has, upon official inquiry, scaled down the farm mortgages in that State to some $65,000,000. This is a reduction of one-half. Doubtless the facts would, if known, scale down all these statements in the same proportion.

I might well dismiss this matter without further comment, but I will put against these wild figures the result of the investigations of Edward Atkinson, published in Bradstreet's. Mr. Atkinson's intelligence and fairness no one will seriously question. Speaking of the farmers of the West, he says:

> Among the various objections or criticisms which were made in the columns of the London Times were several very positive assertions that the Western farmers of this country were generally bankrupt, or were losing money, especially on wheat, and were being eaten up by mortgages and taxes. It occurred to me, however, that these statements could doubtless be disproved by giving the experience of some of the corporations or firms which have been in the business of lending Eastern capital upon mortgages secured by Western farms during the last few years.

In reply to my questions, I have received ten communications, covering a term of years ranging from four to thirty-eight. A summary of the replies, disregarding fractions, is as follows:

Number of mortgages, 200,000.
Total amount loaned, $180,000,000.
Average per mortgage, $900.
Already paid, 119,000 mortgages.
Amount outstanding, $75,000,000.

The total number of foreclosures is not given in all cases; in some the amount is given, in others the number. By computation on the average, the total number can not exceed 1,000.

The reduction in the rate of interest has been from 10 per cent. annual interest and 10 per cent. commission on a five years' mortgage to an average of 6½ to 7½ per cent. at the present time without commission.

The business "has, to a great extent, ceased in Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, and we might also include Iowa; but it is still conducted farther West, in Kansas, Nebraska, Dakota," etc. "Many of those to whom loans were first made are now lenders through the same corporation."

"The present conditions indicate widespread and almost universal prosperity."

I have attempted to see if there was any difference in the conditions of the wheat-growing sections and the corn-growing sections, but I have found none.

So at last we find the truth to be that the business of farm mortgaging "has, to a great extent, ceased in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois," and probably in Iowa; that many of these farmers who were formerly borrowers have become money-lenders, and that the present conditions indicate widespread, if not universal, prosperity.

But, continuing, Mr. Atkinson says:

The foreclosures have been few, not 1 per cent. in point of number of the whole number negotiated. There have been a few losses in particular cases; but, as a whole, the sale of land taken on foreclosure has paid a profit. The net aggregate result is no loss. The number of foreclosures outstanding at the present time is unusually small. The interest is being promptly met. All the comments, statements, and conditions point to prosperity among the farmers rather than to adversity.

It may be remarked that the money which the farmer receives to-day is at least 50 per cent. greater in purchasing power with respect to tools, machines, clothing, and food than it was in the first period, to wit, 1870 to 1872. The wages on the great farms are now $25, with board, for the small force which is retained throughout the year, and $2 per day, with board, for the larger additional force required during the harvest season. Had it not been for the invention of the self-binder it would have taken a force during the harvest season of at least 100,000 men, probably more, to bind a single crop. It is difficult to see how the crops made could have been saved under such conditions, since no such number of available men could have been found for the temporary work of the short harvest season.

* * * * * * *

It is interesting to observe in the reports of some of the older land-mortgage companies that many of the farmers to whom their money was lent at high rates of interest in the early period of their history in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Michigan, are now lending their surplus profits derived from farming at much lower rates to the new-comers or the pioneers of the wheat-producing territory of Kansas, Nebraska, Minnesota, and Dakota.

If the farmers of these ten States have borrowed money, they have made profitable use of it in building up their industry. In a single decade improved lands in these States have increased from 52,306,584 to 135,692,000 acres, or by more than 160 per cent., and their value has advanced per acre by quite 100 per cent. The value of their annual agricultural product has been increased also by a per cent. quite as marvelous.

Sir, this attempt to prove that the protective policy is impoverishing our American farmer is a foreign invention. Mongredien, the London Times, and the Cobden Club gave it currency, and a few of the British economical writers made a disastrous attempt to prove it. Free trade writers and speakers here joined in the chorus. The facts I have shown, the results of reliable and non-partisan investigations, prove these assertions as to the amount of farm incumbrances to be wholly and ridiculously false. The truth is, the American farmer is more prosperous than any of the world. If the farm industry on the Atlantic seaboard is more prosperous than that of the Ohio, Mississippi, and Missouri Valleys, it is only because it is nearer the better markets furnished by the great manufacturing centers. In the East the farm and the factory are near each other. Protection has stimulated manufactures, and the workshop is planted by the side of the farm.

The cost of transportation is little or nothing. The operatives in the factory are the consumers of the farm product. These create a demand for the fruits of the orchard and the garden, and for the product of the poultry-yard, the dairy, and the field. The large demand and the certain market thus created make farming profitable. Similar conditions will bring like results to the farmers of the West. To maintain these conditions, to make the farmers' market certain and profitable, enterprise must be encouraged and labor assured constant employment at remunerative wages. When the farm and the factory are side by side, the farmer will sell his surplus in the dearer and supply his wants in the cheaper market.

But, sir, I was speaking more particularly of the financial condition of our agricultural people. I have denied that they were bankrupt or in danger of bankruptcy, or that they were oppressed by our tariff legislation. On the contrary there is a steady and gratifying growth in the resources of the farming class. This is especially true of the farmer of the West. If he has contracted debts it is because his credit is good.

Not only have the enemies of protection paraded before the country reckless statements about the sum of farm incumbrances, but they say with equal recklessness that notwithstanding our wonderful development in wealth during the past twenty years, agriculture has gone backward. Wonderful discovery! Leading free-trade journals prove it by asserting that by reason of a high tariff, I suppose, the value of live-stock in the United States actually decreased during the ten years preceding 1880.

By skillfully juggling with figures and facts this statement is made to appear true. The operation was easy. The value of the first year in the term was made on the basis of greenbacks, the value of the last year on the basis of gold. Before me I have what purport to be the official figures of the Government by which it is shown that the gold value of live-stock in the United States between 1870 and 1884 increased by more than 100 per cent.

Words will not add force to this refutation. The charge that the tariff has brought disaster on the cattle or live-stock industry is simply false. The facts disprove it, and it is to be hoped that even in the excitement of political controversy the falsehood will not be repeated.

But, Mr. Speaker, if agriculture is languishing in protective America under the weight of its system of plunder and robbery, certainly in England, under the enlightened policy of revenue reform and free-trade—a policy that admits, it is boastingly said the English and Irish farmer to the world's markets—there will be found such a marvelous agricultural prosperity as will demonstrate the wisdom of free-trade legislation. Let us take a glance at the condition of the farmers in this free-trade paradise. It is a fact, openly and publicly proclaimed quite recently by the British minister of agriculture, that the farming industry in Great Britain is in a deplorable state, that farmers in large numbers are idle, that a vast acreage of tillable land is out of cultivation, that agricultural values have shrunken $200,000,000 during the past year. He said further that this depressed condition had not only disastrously affected the cattle and sheep industry of the country, but had left nearly one million of people out of employment.

The London Colliery Guardian, an industrial paper, speaking on this subject, among other things says:

The case of the farmer who tills the soil is worse even than that of the landlord who owns it; for, while the landlord has got the land, the English farmer, in a very large number of cases, has absolutely lost his all. The natural result has come to pass. Agricultural land-owners have made up their minds to seek for estates in other countries, where they can obtain exemption from the burdens that encumber and harass them at home, while the British farmer has long ago fallen into the slough of despond, whence it appears that emigration and a new start in a new country are the only remedies fit for his extrication. If all this sounds like a dirge, it is only because no other pæan is possible.

Mr. Pettifer, of Macclesfield, England, in a public speech at that place on the 8th of February last, said:

What has been taking place in this country, especially during the past ten years, is this: the artisan and mechanic have been buying their food in the lowest-priced foreign market, not caring even if this meant ruin to the British producer, who should be their best customer, while the agriculturist has been buying in a market made artificially cheap by foreign competition, not caring if by so doing he was bringing down the profits of the manufacturers and throwing out of employment thousands of artisans; and now this game of beggar-my-neighbor all around has come to this, that hundreds of thousands of acres of land have gone out of tillage into pasture, while vast numbers of agricultural laborers have been driven into the towns to swell the ranks of the unemployed, they in their turn being thrown out of work by reason of the reduction in the purchasing power of the agricultural portion of the community; and the only remedy the so-called political economists and philosophers, who alone are responsible for this state of things, have to offer is State-aided emigration, which simply means transporting the very pick of our artisans and laborers to a Protectionist country or colony to look for that living they can obtain in free-trade England.

This is the condition to-day of agriculture in free-trade England, and certainly it has not been ruined by robber tariffs. The English farmer is enjoying the feast to which he has been invited by free trade and the Cobden Club. How would our farmers like to join him?

Holland also was a protective country until a few years ago. Her agricultural people were then prosperous and contented. But they were induced to accept the English policy of free trade. Now there are business stagnation, poverty, and widespread distress in Holland. Mechanics and all manner of wage-earners are out of employment. An American of national reputation, speaking of that country a few weeks ago, said:

I met one of the most eminent business men in Holland, and he said to me that the manufactures of Holland were stagnant, that business in Holland was no longer remunerative, and there was a great deal of poverty and distress among the mechanics and laboring classes. I said to him: "How do you account for this change?" He said: "Because Holland adopted a few years ago free trade, and the law has ruined us."

"Well," I said, "give me some instances."

"Well, for instance, we raise in Holland a very superior breed of cattle. England is free trade nominally, but when she found that the cattle coming from our farms were destroying her cattle industry, when she found that we could send better cattle at cheaper prices than she could raise them, she was free trade, and, of course, could not tax them, but her board of trade issued an ordinance that all Holland cattle had pleuro-pneumonia, and have not permitted a head of our cattle to enter England for four years. That is the free-trade way England has of protecting her industries when they are pinched."

But to return to Great Britain, for we are to accept her economical system as our model. Here is what is said of her languishing agriculture by one of her leading journals:

The aggregate value of agricultural land in Great Britain has already fallen within a few years from £2,000,000,000 to £1,500,000,000, a depreciation of 25 per cent. As it is customary in Great Britain to advance 75 per cent. on the value of freehold property or real estate under mortgage, it will be seen that the fall in values has destroyed at one blow the entire margin of security of the most conservative 4 per cent. investment in the old country, and the end is not yet.

Why are agricultural laborers leaving England and flocking to our shores? It is because of the depressed condition of her industries and the prosperous condition of ours. Immigration from Great Britain is increasing at the rate of 50,000 a year. The prosperity of our agriculture is bringing farmers and farm laborers to us from all parts of Europe.

The American farmer is better equipped with farm implements, better clothed and fed, better housed and educated, and more prosperous and contented than any in the world.

But farmers are told by theorists that free trade will open to the products of the farm the markets of the world; that in this great world market he will reach a larger body of consumers, an increased demand, and an enhanced price for all he has for sale. This is a pleasing illusion. The farm product now goes wherever there is a demand for it. If experience has taught us anything it has taught us that our farmer must rely almost exclusively on his home market for the sale of his surplus. Of the annual farm product, valued at $3,000,000,000, but about 8 per cent. is sold abroad. He sells 92 per cent. of it at home. It is his interest to have home consumption maintained and increased. When he seeks a foreign market he finds it supplied with almost everything he has to sell. In the sale of his wheat and other cereals he finds sharp competition from the granaries of Russia, Austria-Hungary, and British India.

The area of the wheat lands in Russia and India is rapidly increasing. Increasing railroad facilities, with farm labor costing but 8 to 12 cents per day, will soon enable India to put her wheat down in London and other European markets at prices that will successfully compete with the American wheat-raiser. Take off the tariff of 20 cents per bushel and India can put her wheat down in the New York market to-day as cheaply as can the American farmer. The wheat farmer in Russia and India has a vast advantage in the cost of production and transportation over his American competitor, and he will soon have control of the wheat markets of Europe.

The time will come when a higher tariff will be demanded to secure to our wheat product our home market.

Why do I say this? Sir, but the other day Lord Randolph Churchill told the English farmers that they would be compelled in the near future to abandon wheat raising because of the competition of India. That country has already 27,000,000 acres under wheat cultivation, and its wheat product in 1886 was 289,000,000 bushels. Her 250,000,000 people live on rice and millet, and her whole wheat crop is exported. Already Great Britain has built 14,000 miles of railroad in India to aid that country in putting her wheat into the markets of Europe. When the eastern market is filled by her home product, our foreign market is gone and our home one in danger.

Germany has established a corn tax or tariff that absolutely prohibits the importation of American wheat into South Germany. The following is from the report of J. C. Monaghan, United States consul at Mannheim, under date of January 28 last:

The first tax was 1 mark, or 23.8 cents per 220 pounds; this was increased to 3 (68 cents), and very recently to 5 marks ($1.19) per 220 pounds. Now it is a notorious fact the English millers preferred North German grain, and just as notorious that the South German millers not only did not, but preferred the grain of the United States. There is said to be a softness about the German product and a hardness about the American, and upon these properties is based the preference in each case. Since the increase of the tax to 3 marks (68 cents) and then to 5 ($1.19) per 220 pounds, the grain trade of South Germany with America and Russia has ceased to exist. American wheat costs about 15½ marks ($3.70) per 100 kilograms (220 pounds), including cost, freight, and insurance to Rotterdam; add to this cost of Rhine freight, 15 to 17 cents plus a 5-mark ($1.19) duty, and American grain appears upon the exchange schedules at 21½ marks ($5.11) per 100 kilograms (220 pounds), the duty alone being about 30 per cent.

Since South Germany must import, she is compelled to take the North German grain; this she can find in her markets at 18 marks ($4.28) per 100 kilograms (220 pounds). This gives the North German grain a 3½-mark (80 cents) start, or 15 to 20 per cent. advantage. The difference is too great to be overcome by anything like local prejudice or preference; the most that choice permits of is from three-quarters (18 cents) to a mark (23.8 cents) more for American than German grain, but as we have seen, the difference is 3½ (80 cents). So long as the duty remains at 5 marks ($1.19) per 100 kiloliters, a resumption of business is not possible, except when crops fail in the Holstein-Pomeranian or throughout the German provinces. It may be mentioned that the grain from the North German provinces is shipped from ports on the Baltic to Rotterdam and Antwerp, thence up the Rhine in barges.

Since the exclusion of foreign grains became a fact, the provinces of Middle Germany, notably Prussian Saxony, Hanover, and Brunswick, blessed as they are with a good climate, have begun grain-raising for the South German market. Before the tax time grain from these provinces was almost unknown, competition being rendered impossible by the expenses of rail shipment. Five marks ($1.19) duty on the 100 kilograms (220 pounds) of foreign grain has removed the obstacle, hence the new impulse; besides, the grains produced in these provinces (Rivets) were not liked. Now the South German miller and consumer must take them whether he likes or not; for 10 marks ($2.38) a hundred kilograms will come should 5 marks cease to be powerful enough to exclude foreign, and protect home, producers.

The result of this German protection is that Prussia, Saxony, Hanover, and Brunswick have gone into wheat-raising for the South German market.

Europe's supply of orchard fruits and vegetables is equal to its wants. Great Britain is the greatest hay-producing country in the world. In the production of wool, live-stock, hides, tallow, and sugar we have competitors all over Europe, in the countries south of us, and in nearly all the islands of the ocean. A few years ago we supplied 85 per cent. of the cotton of the world, but to-day we supply but 67 per cent. of it. Egypt and India are large producers of cotton. Our hog product is excluded from the markets of Germany and France.

The fruits of the garden and the farm come across the ocean and enter our markets and in competition with us. Cabbages come to us from Holland; potatoes from Scotland, Nova Scotia, and Canada; rye from Canada; pease, beans, hay, and eggs from Denmark and Norway; onions from Spain and Egypt; tobacco from Sumatra; wool from South America, South Africa, Australia, and elsewhere, and cattle from Mexico.

We have imported 700,000 bushels of potatoes in a single month, and over 18,000,000 dozens of eggs in one year. Canada sells 3,000,000 bushels of rye in our markets annually, and last year our imports of food products, exclusive of sugar, tea, coffee, and tobacco, were valued at over $57,000,000. The annual increase of our population consume and will consume more of the farm product than we sell abroad. Our home market is the farmer's only hope, and to destroy it is to destroy his industry. This home market will expand with our increasing population, and immigration alone is adding to this from 500,000 to 700,000 each year.

How shall we insure continued prosperity to agriculture? Build up mills and shops and factories, these great industrial hearts that send their currents along every business artery and give tone and strength to our whole industrial and social fabric. Men in the workshop and the factory are the patrons of the men on the farm. Increase their numbers and you increase the farmer's market.

Whatever—

Says Adam Smith—

tends to diminish in any country the number of artificers and manufacturers tends to diminish the home market, the most important of all markets for the crude products of the land

Draw from the farm as many laborers as possible and put them in the factories and a home market is thereby created for every farm product. This is no new doctrine. It was taught by Washington, Hamilton, and Jackson. Let me read an extract from the oft-quoted letter of Jackson to Dr. Coleman:

Where has the American farmer a market for his surplus products? Except for cotton he has neither a foreign nor a home market. Does this not clearly prove, when there is no market either at home or abroad, that there is too much labor employed in agriculture and that the channels of labor should be multiplied? Common sense points out at once the remedy. Draw from agriculture the superabundant labor, employ it in mechanism and manufactures, thereby creating a home market for your breadstuffs and distributing labor to a most profitable account, and benefits to the country will result.

Take from agriculture in the United States 600,000 men, women, and children, and you at once give a home market for more breadstuffs than all Europe now furnishes us. In short, sir, we have been too long subject to the policy of the British merchants. It is time we should become a little more Americanized, and instead of feeding the paupers and laborers of Europe, feed our own, or else in a short time, by continuing our present policy, we shall all be paupers ourselves.

This is as true to-day as it was in 1824. Every factory that gives employment to labor adds to the value of the farm and its product. This fact is demonstrated by farm values in every manufacturing section of the United States. Steel-rail mills and other manufactures have been recently established in Alabama and the increase in the value of farm lands in the vicinity of Birmingham and Decatur has been phenomenal. I have the authority of the Birmingham Age for saying:

Around about Birmingham farming and such lands as are only suitable for farming have doubled, trebled, yes, even quadrupled, in value. Just a short time ago some farming lands in the neighborhood of Decatur, which is rapidly growing to be a manufacturing city, sold for over $100,000. The same land could have been bought a year or so ago at about $5,000.

The fact is not disputed that the value of agricultural land is the greatest in those sections where the population is most largely working in the factory or the mine or industrial pursuits other than farming. The lowest values are found where the greatest proportion of the people are engaged in farming. To prove this the agricultural sections of the Union, including all the States and the two Territories of Washington and Dakota, have been divided into four groups.

This is the result.

Group.	No. acres in cultivation.	Per cent. of persons in agriculture.	Per cent. engaged in other employments.	Value of farm lands per acre.
1	75,718,247	19	81	$41.97
2	112,321,257	42	58	30.55
3	237,873,000	58	42	13.53
4	108,636,796	77	23	5.18

The accuracy of this grouping is proven by an examination of the States in detail, for the value of farm land in five manufacturing States per acre stands thus:

Massachusetts	$43.52
Connecticut	49.34
Pennsylvania	49.30
New York	44.41
New Jersey	65.16

And in the five farming States thus:

South Carolina	$5.19
North Carolina	6.07
Virginia	10.89
Georgia	4.30
West Virginia	13.06

It will be observed that in West Virginia the land is higher than in Georgia, Virginia, or the Carolinas, and this is for the reason that it borders on the great manufacturing State of Pennsylvania, whose large body of operatives afford it a home market, and because it is beginning also to engage in manufactures and mining.

The intelligent farmer knows that the policy that gives the country an extended and diversified industry, that increases manufacturing enterprises, that gives the laborer in the shops and the mines steady employment and good wages, is a benefit to agriculture. These conditions protection gives the country.

As manufacture grows so does agriculture, for each contributes to the success of the other. Manufacture gives increased employment to labor; agriculture feeds it; manufacture needs material and the farmer supplies it. Of the wages paid the factory hand the farmer gets a part in return for what he sells. The census reports tell a story full of instruction, for they show that on the journey of prosperity or adversity these industries march side by side. I invite attention to these tables, compiled from the census reports:

It is a truth, a truth that can not be repeated too often or be too forcibly impressed, that whatever benefits one industry benefits all, and whatever strikes down one industry injures every other industry in the whole country. In this connection the Boston Advertiser gives figures which, in its own words, "tell a most significant story:"

In the year 1885, the wages for transient farm labor by the day were: In Massachusetts, $1.50; New York, $1.26; New Jersey, $1.17; Delaware, $1; Maryland, 93 cents; Virginia, 71 cents; South Carolina, 60 cents. Not only is the farmer most prosperous in those parts of the country where manufactories are most flourishing, but the whole industrial history of this country shows that periods of decline in manufactures have also been periods of decline in the profits of farming.

Forty years ago the average monthly wages of farm laborers, when paid all in cash, without board, were $13.25. In 1879, when, after the long industrial stagnation, furnace fires began to be relighted and spindles to move, the average price of farm labor, all in cash, was $16.16 per month. In 1882, after specie payments had been resumed and business had recovered its normal condition, the average price paid to men for working on farms was $18.58 per month. The same statistics show that what is true of farm labor is true, in every case, of farm products and the value of farm lands.

The farmer is directly protected by tariff legislation. He has to compete in our markets with imported farm products. Last year there came to us from abroad rye, wheat, live-stock, hay, wool, tobacco, eggs, vegetables, and dairy products in large quantities.

As our laws now are the following tariff duties are imposed, in the interest of our farmers, on agricultural products:

Wool, from 2½ to 12 cents per pound; potatoes, 15 cents per bushel; butter, 4 cents per pound; cheese, 4 cents per pound; wheat, 20 cents per bushel; rye and barley, 10 cents per bushel; Indian corn, 10 cents per bushel; honey, 20 cents per gallon; milk, preserved, 20 per cent. ad valorem; hams and bacon, 2 cents per pound; beef and pork, 1 cent. per pound; lard, 2 cents per pound; pickles, 35 per cent. ad valorem; vegetables, 30 per cent. ad valorem; vinegar, 7½ cents per gallon; flax, $20 per ton; hemp, $25 per ton.

These duties should be increased, and particularly on rye, wheat, and potatoes, cabbage and other vegetables, but the pending Democratic free-trade bill, instead of strengthening the farmer's protection, weakens it by putting such important farm products as wool, hemp, and flax on the free-list. And to these are added garden-seeds, beans, peas, meats, game, poultry, beeswax, and fresh vegetables. This measure is a blow at the industry of the husbandman that he will resent at the ballot-box.

If it were true that the farmer, because of the duty on imported goods, has to pay an increased price for such manufactured articles as he is compelled to buy, he is more than reimbursed by the certain and profitable market protection gives his produce. But it is not true, taking a series of years into the calculation, that import duties on foreign goods increase their price to the purchaser. That domestic competition, encouraged by proper safeguards, ultimately cheapens every manufactured article our people are capable of supplying in quantities equal, or nearly equal our necessities, is demonstrated by all our experience. Alexander Hamilton gives the reason why protection secures this result. He says:

Though it were true that the immediate and certain effect of regulations controlling the competition of foreign and domestic fabrics was an increase of price, it is universally true that the contrary is the ultimate effect of every successful manufacture. When a domestic manufacture has attained to perfection, and has engaged in the prosecution of it a competent number of persons, it invariably becomes cheaper. Being free from the heavy charges which attend the importation of foreign commodities, it can be afforded cheaper, and accordingly seldom or never fails to be afforded cheaper in process of time than was the foreign article for which it is the substitute. The internal competition which takes place soon does away everything like monopoly, and by degrees reduces the price of the article to the minimum of a reasonable profit on the capital employed.

Mr. Fillmore, in discussing this question in his annual message in 1852, said:

The first is the effect of large importations of foreign goods upon our currency. Most of the gold of California as fast as it is coined finds its way directly to Europe in payment for goods purchased. In the second place, as our manufacturing establishments are broken down by a competition with foreigners, the capital invested in them is lost, thousands of honest and industrious citizens are thrown out of employment, and the farmer to that extent is deprived of a home market for the sale of his surplus produce. In the third place, the destruction of our manufactures leaves the foreigner without competition in our market, and he consequently raises the price of the article sent here for sale, as is now seen in the increased cost of iron imported from England. The prosperity and wealth of every nation must depend upon its protective industry. The farmer is stimulated to exertion by finding a ready market for his surplus products, and benefited by being able to exchange, without loss of time or expense of transportation, for the manufactures which his comfort or convenience requires. This is always done to the best advantage where a portion of the community in which he lives is engaged in other pursuits.

And, again:

But a duty laid on an article that can be produced here stimulate the skill and industry of our own country to produce the same article, which is brought into the market in competition with the foreign article, and the importer is thus compelled to reduce his price to that at which the domestic article can be sold, thereby throwing a part of the duty on the producer of the foreign article. The continuance of this process creates the skill and invites the capital, which finally enables us to produce the article much cheaper than it could have been procured abroad, thereby benefiting both the producer and the consumer at home. The consequence of this is that the artisan and the agriculturist are brought together, each affords a ready market for the produce of the other, and the whole country becomes prosperous, and the ability to produce every necessary of life renders us independent in war as well as in peace.

It is a fact from which there is no escape that under our tariff legislation there has been a steady cheapening of the product of the factory; of cotton and woolen goods; of all kinds of textiles; of furniture, household goods, iron, steel, pottery, tools, glass and glassware, machinery, and, in fact, every manufacture furnished by our home industries. But, sir, it is said that our tariff legislation robs the farmer; that it impoverishes his industry, although it is admitted that our national growth and progress is the marvel of the age. The prosperity of the nation is but the sum of the individual prosperity of its people. How could the nation secure this wondrous development if it be true that its greatest industry, one in which one-seventh or 9,000,000 of its people are directly concerned; one that is the very bed-rock of its social, political, and industrial system, is plundered of its substance by class or unjust legislation?

Has the nation prospered? During the ten years preceding 1880 our increase in manufactures more than equaled that of France and Germany and Great Britain. In a period of twenty years the valuation of our real and personal property advanced from $16,159,616,000 to $43,642,000,000 and in the same period our money circulation was quadrupled. In the mean time we built railroads sufficient in length to more than five times encircle the globe. All this has been done under protection.

Who can fathom our national future if our industrial system is maintained? We need not go abroad for markets or goods, for our home resources are limitless and we need but develop them to enable us to lead, by an immeasurable distance, any people of the world. Look at the map of the world. Our territorial extent is more than three times greater than all Great Britain, Ireland, France, Germany, Spain, Portugal, Switzerland, Denmark, and Greece.

Our fuel supply exceeds by twenty times that of all Europe, while our mining industries exceed those of England combined with those of Asia, Africa, South America, and Mexico. We give the world one-half its precious metals and produce materials boundless in quantity and infinite in variety for the manufacture of everything needed by a human want. With all these we have arable lands capable of supporting the population of the world. We know what the mine, the factory, and the farm have achieved under protection, and the people will hesitate long, in my opinion, before they will overthrow it and accept the dangers of a free-trade policy, which nearly all the nations have repudiated. [Applause.]

[Mr. DOCKERY withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

Mr. McMILLIN. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of revenues, and had come to no resolution thereon.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with an amendment the bill (H. R. 7348) granting the city of Grand Forks, Dak., the right to build two free bridges across Red River, requested a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. VEST, Mr. SAWYER, and Mr. DAVIS as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. McMILLIN. I ask unanimous consent to submit for present consideration the resolution which I send to the desk.

Mr. DUNHAM. Regular order.

Mr. McMILLIN. I trust the gentleman from Illinois will permit me to make a statement concerning this resolution, after which I think he will not object.

On yesterday there was a discussion as to a proposition looking to the amicable limitation of this debate. The committee have arrived at a conclusion on the question, and that conclusion I desire to present to the House and have its action on it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois demands the regular order.

Mr. DUNHAM. Let the resolution be read for information.

The Clerk read as follows:

On Tuesdays, Wednesdays, and Thursdays the Committee of the Whole shall rise at 5.30 p. m. and the House shall take a recess until 8 p. m., the evening sessions to be for debate only. On Mondays and Saturdays the sessions shall end at 5.30 p. m. No change to be made in the present rule as to sessions on Friday night. General debate on the tariff bill shall continue seventeen days after to-day, excluding Sundays, and also any interruptions ordered by the House, a general leave to print to be given.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. DUNHAM. Do I understand this tariff debate is to exclude all other business of the House?

Mr. McMILLIN. The resolution provides such interruptions as the House itself shall make are to be taken out of the time allotted.

Mr. DUNHAM. I understand unanimous consent is asked by that resolution so that the ordinary and usual business of the House is to be set aside and the whole time indicated is to be taken up with this tariff debate.

Mr. McMILLIN. I do not think the resolution justly bears that interpretation.

Mr. DUNHAM. Why not have it agreed to consider this bill for two days and then go on with the other business for two days?

Mr. McMILLIN. That is a question for the House to determine. I will candidly state to the gentleman from Illinois that we have sought to determine what length of debate should be occupied; and that is the proposition to be settled by this resolution.

Mr. McCOMAS. Let me inquire whether a fraction of a day is to be counted as a whole day?

Mr. McMILLIN. The seventeen days are to be counted from to-day, and it provides that where the House interrupts by other business the time occupied is not to be taken out of the seventeen days.

Mr. McCOMAS. Each day the debate is to continue from the reading of the Journal to the adjournment?

Mr. McMILLIN. That is correct.

Mr. McCOMAS. Has a computation been made whether seventeen days will afford time for all gentlemen on this side to address the House who may desire to do so?

Mr. McMILLIN. I will state to the gentleman that is a question of mathematics which could not be determined, in view of the fact there is no one in this House to-day who knows how many members wish to speak. Indeed, many do not know themselves whether they will speak or not on this question.

Mr. McCOMAS. During the time covered by this agreement all those who wish to speak will have the right to do so?

Mr. REED. We have made a calculation as well as we could with the information we had in our possession. There are numbers who have not put their names down on the list who may hereafter be moved by the spirit to wish to express their views. It is provided that there shall be seventeen days of five hours each. I do not see how it would be possible to make it more accurate.

Mr. DUNHAM. I ask the gentleman from Tennessee if it is not a fact that under the terms of that resolution the House can not proceed to the consideration of other business except by unanimous consent?

Mr. McMILLIN. I will state to the gentleman from Illinois that so far as I am concerned I do not believe the resolution bears that interpretation, because we provide that if the House should take up any of the time by other business the time so taken up should not be charged against the agreement.

Mr. DUNHAM. I understand, then, that a majority can take up any other business?

Mr. McMILLIN. Certainly.

Mr. REED. Why it is just as distinct and plain as human language can be. It says that seventeen days, excluding Sundays and any other days which the House may determine to devote to other business, shall be given to this discussion. It is not possible for language to be more explicit.

Mr. DUNHAM. I asked the gentleman from Tennessee for the purpose of getting his understanding as to what it meant.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state, in order to prevent any possible misapprehension hereafter which may grow out of the response of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McCOMAS], that the resolution does not provide that each of the seventeen days shall embrace the whole time after the reading of the Journal. It will be that portion of the day which is devoted to the consideration of this bill in Committee of the Whole; and so the day will commence from whatever time the House may go into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the bill.

Mr. McMILLIN. I intended to be so understood in my response to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will that apply to this evening?

Mr. McMILLIN. It was so understood, for debate only.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will again submit the request of the gentleman from Tennessee. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. DUNHAM. Let the resolution be again read.

The resolution was again reported.

Mr. BUCHANAN. After the statement of the gentleman from Tennessee, that the resolution is meant to include this evening, I would ask whether it is the intention of the committee in framing the resolution to require gentlemen who are upon the list to speak, and who are entitled, according to that list, to an early recognition, to proceed at the night session this evening?

Mr. McMILLIN. I do not know of any power to compel any member to speak at any time; nor would we seek to do so. That was not the design of the committee, and I do not believe that such can be considered as their meaning.

Mr. SPRINGER. If there is no understanding that this night session is to be for debate only on this bill, I wish to submit a request for unanimous consent.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Of course I understand what the gentleman from Tennessee says. But would a gentleman so placed lose his position on the list by not proceeding to-night, for instance?

Mr. McMILLIN. I will state to the gentleman from New Jersey that I would not want to make a statement concerning that, as recognitions are exclusively the province of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that while the Speaker does not preside in Committee of the Whole, yet the practice of the House under such circumstances is not to deprive any gentleman of his proper place for recognition because he may not be ready to speak when his name was reached on the list. If other gentlemen are ready to proceed they will be permitted to do so, and the gentleman first on the list will be recognized at some other time.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I make the suggestion because I have a personal interest in this matter. My name is on the list, and I understand that I am to be the next person recognized; but I do not desire to go on this evening.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. It was understood in committee that the debate at the day session and the night session should be kept altogether separate; so that if any gentleman was occupying the floor and in the midst of a speech when the hour of half past 5 o'clock arrived, he would go over to the next day——

The SPEAKER. Unless he desired to speak at night.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Certainly. And a gentleman who was speaking at night and gave way for a motion to adjourn would continue next evening.

Mr. McMILLIN. That was discussed in committee and understood, as I believe.

Mr. McCOMAS. Is there another list than that now kept by the Speaker's page?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know of any other list than that which is now at the desk.

Mr. SPRINGER. I doubt whether any person will be ready to go on this evening.

Mr. McMILLIN. I will say to the gentleman that some gentlemen are ready to proceed this evening.

Mr. SPRINGER. I wanted to ask unanimous consent that the House take a recess now, and that we have an evening session, to be devoted exclusively to business from the Committee on the Territories.

The SPEAKER. There is already a request pending for unanimous consent.

Mr. SPRINGER. I know.

Mr. REED. Let us dispose of one thing at a time.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Let us dispose of what is before us first.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to considering the resolutions presented by the gentleman from Tennessee at this time?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I wish to state that this rule was intended to continue only during the debate on this bill.

Mr. McMILLIN. That is so understood.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. McMILLIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CENTENNIAL EXPOSITION, CINCINNATI.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported, as a substitute for H. Res. 127, a bill (H. R. 9711) making an appropriation to enable the several Executive Departments of the Government and the Bureau of Agriculture and the Smithsonian Institution, including the National Museum and Commission of Fish and Fisheries, to participate in the Centennial Exposition of the Ohio Valley and Central States, to be held at Cincinnati, Ohio, from July 4 to October 27, 1888; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. McMILLIN. I reserve all points of order on this bill, as I do not know what the report is.

BRIDGE ACROSS OCONEE RIVER.

Mr. CRISP. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bridge bill to which there can be no objection. I have some personal interest in the matter.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that if these requests for unanimous consent proceed the Chair will alternate from one side of the House to the other.

Mr. CRISP. I ask that the title of the bill be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8279) to authorize the county of Laurens, in the State of Georgia, to construct a bridge across the Oconee River at or near Dublin, in said county and State.

Mr. CRISP. I desire to state that this bill contains the usual provisions. This is a river in Georgia with which I am personally well acquainted. I know there is no objection to the bill. Upon this statement I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Has the bill been printed?

Mr. CRISP. The bill has been printed, has been unanimously reported from the Committee on Commerce, and is now on the Calendar.

There being no objection, the reading of the bill was dispensed with.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time by its title, and passed.

Mr. CRISP moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MATTHEW W. BERRYMAN.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 925) for the relief of Matthew W. Berryman, and that the same be now put upon its passage.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the proper accounting officer of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Matthew W. Berryman, of Newark, N. J., a major in the Army of the United States during the war of the rebellion, the sum of —— dollars and —— cents, for services rendered as major of the Tenth Regiment New Jersey Volunteers from the 13th day of October, 1861, to the 23d day of November of the same year.

The bill was reported with the following amendments:

In line 8 insert the words "the emoluments of a major," and strike out the words "the sum of —— dollars and —— cents."

In lines 12 and 13 strike out the words "and the said sum of —— dollars and —— cents is hereby appropriated for that purpose."

Mr. HOLMAN. Let there be some explanation or statement with reference to this bill.

Mr. LEHLBACH. The report is very short. I ask that it be read.

The report (by Mr. BLISS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 925) for the relief of Matthew W. Berryman, having had the same under consideration, respectfully submit the following report:

Matthew W. Berryman was commissioned as major of the Tenth Regiment New Jersey Volunteers on the 13th day of October, 1861, and was mustered into the service on the 23d day of November of the same year. This bill provides that he should be paid for services rendered from the date of his commission. It has been the practice for Congress to authorize such payments in cases of this kind.

Your committee respectfully report the bill back to the House, with the recommendation that it do pass, with the following amendments: Strike out all in line 7 after the word "rebellion," and all words in line 8 before the word "for" in said line, and insert in lieu thereof the words "the emoluments of a major." Strike out all words after the word "year" in line 11.

Mr. STEELE. How is it that this payment can not be made under the general law?

Mr. LEHLBACH. These payments have to be made by act of Congress. It has been customary for every Congress to pass these bills. Major Berryman is entitled to payment for one month's service. He is over eighty years of age, is in poor circumstances, and needs the money. He rendered the service, and this is the only way in which he can get his pay.

Mr. McMILLIN. What is the reason he can not get it under the general law?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I do not know.

Mr. McMILLIN. We ought to know that.

Mr. LEHLBACH. He can only get the pay in this way. Such bills have always passed in this House, and have been unanimously recommended by the committee.

Mr. McMILLIN. The report fails to show the equity on which the case rests.

Mr. LEHLBACH. He rendered service to the Government from the date of his commission, but was not mustered till a later date, and he can only receive his pay from the date of muster.

Mr. McMILLIN. Then it is only a question of pay from the time between the date of receiving his commission and the date of muster?

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the general law covers the case.

Mr. STEELE. The general law governed the case, but I suppose this officer allowed the law to lapse without making application.

Mr. KERR. That law expired by limitation last June.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LEHLBACH moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN R. WOOD AND OTHERS.

Mr. O'FERRALL. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Private Calendar for present consideration the bill (H. R. 6862) for the relief of John R. Wood, John T. Ballard, and John T. Belew.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That John R. Wood, as principal, and John T. Ballard and John T. Belew, as sureties, be, and they are hereby, relieved of the payment of the tax on 154 gallons of brandy, amounting to the sum of $138.60, said brandy having been destroyed by fire on August 3, 1887, near the village of White Hall (Moorman's River post-office), in the county of Albemarle, State of Virginia, and that they be further relieved of all penalties incident to the non-payment of said tax.

SEC. 2. That the United States district attorney for the western district of Virginia be, and he is hereby, directed to dismiss any and all proceedings which may have been or may hereafter be instituted against the said John R. Wood and the said John T. Ballard and John T. Belew, or either of them, for the payment of the said tax or penalties.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. Let there be some explanation of it.

Mr. O'FERRALL. If the House will allow me I think I can make a statement which will probably occupy less time than the reading of the report. John R. Wood was a distiller in Albemarle County, Virginia. His distillery was situated near his house. His house caught fire. It was burned down with the distillery, and all his household goods were destroyed, leaving him in poverty. At the time of the fire there were in his distillery or warehouse 154 gallons of brandy, the tax on which amounted to $138.60. He has not been able to pay that tax by reason of this fire and the destruction of his property. A suit has been instituted in the United States court against him and his sureties. He had no insurance. It was a total loss. The bill provides that he and his sureties shall be relieved of the payment of the $138.60, the tax on the brandy which was burned.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. O'FERRALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVENWORTH CITY AND FORT LEAVENWORTH WATER COMPANY.

Mr. MORRILL called up the bill (H R. 6107) to authorize the sale of a tract of land in the military reservation at Fort Leavenworth, in the State of Kansas.

The bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. I think there ought to be some explanation of the bill.

Mr. MORRILL. I shall be glad to make whatever explanation is required.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that only two minutes remain before the time fixed for taking a recess.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman ought not to insist upon the passage of a bill like that in this hurried manner.

Mr. MORRILL. This is absolutely necessary in order to supply the troops at the fort with water. The fort adjoins the city. This is a tract of 8 or 9 acres which is cut off entirely by the railroad which is now built, and the Secretary of War recommends the passage of this bill providing for the sale of the land, and so does General Sheridan.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let me ask what is the purpose of having the money paid to the Secretary of War?

Mr. MORRILL. That is recommended by the committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. But the money, of course, ought to be accounted for in the Treasury, and there is no provision for the Secretary of War paying it into the Treasury.

Mr. MORRILL. That can easily be arranged, I suppose, by the Secretary of War.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I do not understand that this bill is under consideration.

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. MORRILL. The sale of this land for this purpose is absolutely necessary.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I am perfectly willing to let the land be sold, but I am not willing to pass a bill allowing it to be sold to a single purchaser.

Mr. MORRILL. This is not an individual; it is a water company.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. All the more reason for objecting.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the hour fixed by resolution for a recess has arrived, and unless some arrangement can be made by unanimous consent, the House will now take a recess.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask unanimous consent to extend the time for ten minutes.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask that next Monday night——

The SPEAKER. The hour for the recess having arrived, the House takes a recess until 8 o'clock this evening.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at 8 o'clock p. m.

The House was called to order by Mr. MCMILLIN, who directed the Clerk to read the following communication:

SPEAKER'S ROOM, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, April 25, 1888.

The Hon. BENTON MCMILLIN, of Tennessee, is designated to preside as Speaker pro tempore at this evening's session of the House of Representatives.

JOHN G. CARLISLE, Speaker.

To Hon. JOHN B. CLARK,
Clerk House of Representatives.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of House bill 9051, known as the tariff bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the bill the title of which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of revenue.

Mr. SHAW. Mr. Chairman, no other country has its treasury so encumbered with its riches, and no other people are so appalled at the possible consequences of their patient submission to excessive taxation as the people of the United States. Our boundless resources have enabled us to respond so generously to the unjust exactions of the Government as to cause an annual accumulation of money in the Treasury so large as to embarrass business and imperil the financial system of the country. Such a condition of prosperity needs no liberal or latitudinarian construction of the organic law to foster trade and encourage manufactures, but the best interest of each alike depends on the strictest interpretation of the Constitution.

In the plain import of its language there is safety, but on the uncertain and treacherous sea of liberal construction there may be shipwreck and disaster.

The framers of the Constitution adopted a plain style, without the ambiguity which in later years resorts to phrases unknown to its letter and spirit to discover its meaning and to measure its powers. There have heretofore been parties which disputed whether the Federal Government was the principal or the agent, and whether the people were the master and the Government the servant; but it remained for the "protection" policy to bring in the other common-law relations of parent and child, and guardian and ward. But I can not believe that the framers of the Constitution ever intended that in its interpretation the metaphors of rhetoric should become the premises of logic. For our guidance in construing this wonderful instrument there is transmitted to us the official proceedings of the convention that formulated it, which disclose the purposes intended by its framers; and we have the proceedings of the conventions in the States which ratified and adopted it to teach us what powers were intended to be conferred upon the Federal Government and the legislative branch thereof. In these we shall find a safer guide to correct conclusions than the fanciful similitude of relations drawn from the imagination.

To each of these authorities I will appeal for the fundamental reasons upon which I shall rely in opposing the continuance of a system of taxation that I believe to be unconstitutional in its inception and hurtful throughout all its long continuance. In examining them I find that the proposition to confer on Congress the power was brought before the Federal Convention on the 18th of May, 1787, in a series of resolutions proposing to consider the propriety of conferring on the Government additional powers, and, among others, the following were referred to a select committee:

"TO PROMOTE MANUFACTURES"

To give to Congress the power to secure to literary authors their copyrights for a limited time.

To encourage by proper premiums and provisions the advancement of useful knowledge and discoveries.

To grant patents for useful inventions.

To establish public institutions, rewards, and immunities for the promotion of agriculture, commerce, trades, and manufactures.

It became the duty of that select committee, in its investigation of the subjects referred to it, to inquire into the expediency of investing Congress with powers "for the promotion" of manufactures, and in the event that the committee should find it expedient, it then became its duty further to ascertain the "proper premiums and provisions" over which Congress should be invested with power; what "public institutions, rewards, and immunities" Congress should be authorized to establish for the promotion of agriculture, commerce, trade, and manufactures. After due deliberation, from the 18th of August to the 5th of September, the committee determined that the only power which should be conferred was that contained in the clause of the Constitution which provides that Congress shall have power—

To promote the progress of science and useful arts, by securing for limited times to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries.

Thus the committee virtually rejected the proposition to empower

Congress to "promote manufactures" by any other means than those just mentioned. That the phrase "useful arts" embraces and describes the manufacturing art no one will deny, and that the manufacturing art may be promoted after the manner prescribed by that clause of the Constitution heretofore recited all will readily admit, but the limitation which that clause imposes upon the means to be employed for its promotion effectively excludes all other means; hence it follows as a logical sequence that all efforts to promote the manufacturing art by the imposition of prohibitory or restrictive duties are not based upon any power to be found in the Constitution.

The report of the select committee, which was sustained by the convention, clearly indicates the purpose of the framers of the Constitution in relation to manufactures. The rejected propositions must have made manufactures the subject of the thought and deliberation of the convention, which, after discussing it for seventeen days, solemnly determined that the only power over manufactures which it would confer on Congress was that of securing temporarily to inventors the exclusive advantages which might result from their discoveries. This action of the select committee and the convention can not be otherwise construed than as a virtual rejection of the proposition to invest Congress with any other power relating to manufactures. When, therefore, I find the Federal convention refusing to incorporate in the Constitution a specific power I can not believe it to have intended that the power refused should be derived by implication from any clause of the instrument. Therefore I can not assent to that construction of the taxing clause which contends for the power to lay and collect taxes for any other purpose than that of revenue.

Mr. Clay, the ablest of all the advocates of a protective policy, as early as 1824, replying to Mr. Barbour, of Virginia, said:

The gentleman from Virginia has entirely mistaken the clause of the Constitution on which we rely. It is that which gives to Congress the power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations."

It has been shown that in the propositions submitted to the select committee of the Federal convention there was a clause conferring on Congress power "to promote agriculture, commerce, trades, and manufactures," and that the clause was rejected so far as it applied to agriculture, trade, and manufactures. But Congress was authorized to "regulate" one of the subjects, namely, commerce. Evidently the rejection of three of the subjects can not be construed as including any or all of them in the power to regulate the one retained. Manufactures are no nearer related to commerce than agriculture and trade. Manufactures and commerce are dissimilar, and can not be made synonymous by construction. Each is a distinct, determined, and defined subject, and they can not be identified without violence to recognized definitions, as well as to constitutional bearings. Commerce is the interchange of commodities between different localities. Manufactures are local, founded for the production of commodities and not for their interchange. Commerce supplies the American citizen, in return for the products of his labor, with the varied products of distant climes. Manufactures convert his raw materials into fabrics for consumption. Sophistry itself can not identify things thus distinct, nor render synonymous the terms and phrases by which they are represented. Yet the argument which derives the power to promote manufactures from the power to regulate commerce does, indeed, identify the subjects and renders the terms substantially the same.

It would seem that the power to regulate commerce was granted to Congress with a view to the perfection of our commercial relations with foreign nations, as well as to secure domestic tranquillity, by extinguishing a fruitful subject of dispute between the States, but as soon as the protective policy, by its liberal construction, perverted the commerce-regulating power to selfish ends, discord and division arose between agriculture and manufactures, which at one period of our history nearly brought about a separation of the States.

The convention which framed the Constitution, as we have seen, refused to confer on Congress the power to promote manufactures, except as has been stated; it confined the taxing power to a specific and well-defined purpose, and fixed the commerce-regulating clause within well-marked limits. Whilst I maintain that the intention of the Constitution must prevail in its construction, I also hold with Chief-Justice Marshall—

That this intention must be collected from its words; that its words are to be understood in that sense in which they are generally used by those for whom the instrument was intended; that its provisions are neither to be restricted into insignificance nor extended to objects not comprehended in them, nor contemplated by its framers—

I respectfully submit, therefore, that any system of import duties laid for any purpose other than that specified in the taxing clause, or any regulation of commerce which embraces an arrangement of import duties, is unconstitutional, and in the present condition of our country's manufactures, unnecessary and inexcusable.

The protective system has not only violated the letter and spirit of the Constitution, but, appealing to the most selfish instincts, has been advocated for misleading ends, and with delusive and deceptive purposes. Many of its advocates profess to be moved by a desire to make this country commercially independent. But they should not permit their zeal for a home market to render them unmindful of the fact that the commercial independence of any people can only be had and maintained at the cost of their civilization, and that the manifold blessings of creation are only to be enjoyed by the interchange of products among the different nations of the earth.

An All-Wise Creator gave to no country the possibility of commercial independence by endowing it with a soil and climate adapted to the production of every commodity desired, by and necessary to, the wants of man. No single nation covers the earth from north to south, and though Great Britain "has dotted over the surface of the whole globe with her possessions and military posts, whose morning drum-beat, following the sun and keeping company with the hours, circles the earth with one continuous and unbroken strain of the martial airs of England," it is political power and not commercial independence that marks her dominion.

It is not independence but interdependence which the providence of Almighty God designed for the inhabitants of the earth when He collected them into nations upon lands of different soils and climates. It is this interdependence of nations which, compelling the interchange of commodities, created commerce; and the substitution of commercial independence among nations, if it were possible, would rot every ship and close every port. Voltaire formulated the protective policy in the selfish maxim that "Such is the lot of humanity that the patriotic desire for one's country's grandeur is but a wish for the humiliation of one's neighbor," and "that it is impossible for one country to gain except by the loss of another." That was the regnant idea of the mercantile system of political economy, which held that only money constituted wealth, and of the manufacturing system, which supposed that national prosperity depended entirely on manufactures, and both systems were founded upon the fallacious doctrine that selling as much as possible to, and buying as little as possible from, foreign nations was the royal road to national wealth and prosperity. Out of these chimerical ideas sprang the desire for commercial independence, which in turn gave origin to a delusive wish for at which agriculture was promised more remunerative prices than could be had in the markets of all the world; and, pregnant with promises, the protective policy pledged itself to build a manufacturing establishment in every community whose operatives would consume all that the soil of the surrounding country could yield under the most improved system of cultivation. In all discussions of the tariff the home market fallacy has been the attractive feature relied on to recommend the protective policy. But after seventy years of waiting we seem to be much farther in 1888 from a home market for all our agricultural products than we were in 1816. Instead of consuming all we grew in 1887 we shipped away from the home market of 60,000,000 of people $525,000,000 worth of agricultural products. Not only is the "home market" impracticable, but if every people could consume all the products of their industry, to do so would turn back the progress of the age and stay the march of civilization. And yet from 1816, when this seductive policy was first broached, its advocates, in every party, have clung to the theory of isolation and to schemes for shutting out foreign productions, or admitting them only under the restraining influence of high taxation. The means by which we have been endeavoring to create a "home market," and which our friends on the other side of this Chamber denominate the "American system," are all comprehended in that restrictive policy which England once practiced, but has long since abandoned, without its protective feature to agriculture. The restrictive policy of England was complete; agriculture was protected by corn laws, commerce by navigation laws, and manufactures by duties and prohibitions. But we have emasculated the English system and left agriculture without protection, thereby enabling manufactures to rob it by placing one hand of the Government in the pockets of the people and with the other bestowing their taxes on a favored few. It is, however,

None the less robbery because it is done under the forms of law and is called taxation.

Along with these fallacies of "commercial independence" and a "home market," the advocates of protection mistake the international account current of the custom-house for a between nations.

The argument that an excess of exports over imports indicates invariably a prosperous trade, can be easier refuted by examples than by theoretical discussion. As merchants do not give away the goods they export, it can not be denied that every measure of merchandise exported brings back to this country a measure of foreign merchandise, which, whether more or less, is the market's estimation of the two values. The merchant at Baltimore who ships Western corn expects to sell it in the European market at an advance, and if he does not get that advance, either in cash or in goods which will sell in this country for more than he paid for the corn, freight, insurance, interest, and exchange included, he does not repeat the venture. But as the shipments continue it may be assumed that Western corn sells in Europe for more than it is worth in this country.

When $100,000 worth of Western corn is exported it is entered on the custom-house books at that amount, and when it arrives at a foreign port either the invoice valuation is entered on the custom-house books or an appraised valuation is substituted, but neither influences or affects the market value of the corn, whether the custom-house entry shows $90,000, or $100,000, or $115,000, according as the appraisement, when made, is below, equal to, or above the invoice valuation. The corn is sold after the entry or appraisement is made and brings the market price without regard to the custom-house return. If the Baltimore merchant's venture sells for $115,000, while the custom-house at Baltimore and at Liverpool shows only $100,000, there is a profit, which he invests in English goods and ships to Baltimore. The export entry at the Liverpool custom-house is $115,000 and the import entry at Baltimore is $115,000. The custom-house returns tell nothing whatever about the trade; that must be learned from the transaction, and can only be obtained from the merchant. The Baltimore merchant realized a profit on the American corn, and the Liverpool merchant realized a profit on the English goods. The Baltimore merchant bought English goods because they would sell in the American market for more than he gave for the corn, and the Liverpool merchant bought the American corn because it was worth in Liverpool more than the English goods. Both merchants made a profit, and each nation grew wealthier by the exchange.

The value of American exports, as shown by custom-house books, is restrained by no duty charge; hence there is nothing to prevent a higher valuation than may be realized, while American imports are more likely to be undervalued to escape the payment of a portion of the duty. Hence the tendency is to overvalue exports and undervalue imports, and thus a nominal and by no means real excess of exports is shown by custom-house returns. The undervaluation of imports is one of the evils of the ad valorem system of appraisement, the change of which has been repeatedly urged upon Congress. The $666,000,000 of exports in 1886, and the $636,000,000 of imports in the same year, show a balance of $30,000,000 in our favor, but how much of that balance is due to the overvaluation of exports and to the undervaluation of imports can not be ascertained. But that the so-called favorable balance of trade was not liquidated in precious metals is shown from the export and import of gold and silver. Here there is no possibility of over or under valuation; and notwithstanding the protective theory of the balance-of-trade idea, that the whole world owed the United States a balance of $30,000,000 on that year's trade, which was paid in precious metals, the same custom-house returns show that our export of precious metals exceeded our import by $34,000,000. It is contended by the protective theorist that the excess of merchandise exports came back through the silent and unobserved channel of bills of exchange. If that be true, it is the heaviest blow the balance-of-trade theory can receive, for it proves that the custom-house returns do not include all or even the most essential information as to the trade of the country with foreign nations. But the custom-house returns do exhibit in part the operation of the tariff, and show that the $666,000,000 worth of American exports, when exchanged for the goods of foreign countries and such goods are brought back to our shores, they are met with an average duty of 40 per cent., which, notwithstanding $212,000,000 of these goods were admitted duty free, the remaining $454,000,000 were increased in cost, but not in value, by $181,600,000 to the consumer. This latter sum is the premium exacted by "protection," to which must be added the untold millions which duties that are prohibitory enable the protected classes to filch from the people.

If the "protective" policy is to be perpetuated, let tariff duties be so laid that those who pay them may know how much they pay the Government for revenue and how much for "protection." Such a method of levying duties would enable the people to set off the cost against the benefits of "protection," and to intelligently decide whether it is worth continuing. The sum we are made to pay for it is an unknown one, and hence we are left without any certain means of ascertaining the wisdom of the outlay. Moreover, it is a right of a free people to know for what purpose they are taxed, yet this right is abridged by the manner in which duties are now levied. But the protectionists will oppose any change in laying tariff duties whereby the masses may learn how much of their substance is sacrificed to selfish greed, for well they know that the protective policy could not long survive the acquisition of such knowledge by the people.

The impossibility of commercial independence is shown by experience, the home market illusion disappears before the fact that after providing for our people more bountifully than any other people on earth are provided for, we send for sale abroad more than $500,000,000 of agricultural products, because we can not consume them at home, and the balance of trade mystification is made plain by the application of the principles of trade. Though these fallacies may still cloud discussion, they are subordinated to

THE CLAIM THAT PROTECTION GUARDS THE AMERICAN LABORER AGAINST COMPETITION WITH THE "PAUPER LABOR" OF OTHER COUNTRIES.

Let us examine the merits of this claim, and if it be established, I will never consent to change a system of taxation which really improves the condition of the American workingman; and I shall have much less regard for the Constitution of my country if it be shown that in its operation it tends to drag down the American mechanic to the level of the ill-fed, ill-clothed, and oppressed laborers of Europe.

I find in a foot-note in McMaster's History of the People of the United States, an account of which states that—

In the great cities unskilled workmen were hired by the day, bought their own food, and found their own lodgings. But in the country, on the farms, or wherever a hand was employed on some public work, they were fed and lodged by the employer and given a few dollars a month. On the Pennsylvania canals the diggers ate the coarsest diet, were housed in the rudest sheds, and paid $6 a month from May to November, and $5 a month from November to May. Hodcarriers and mortar-mixers, diggers and choppers, who, from 1793 to 1800, labored on the public buildings and cut the streets and avenues of Washington City, received $70 a year, or, if they wished, $60 for all the work they could perform from March 1 to December 20. The hours of work were invariably from sunrise to sunset. Wages at Albany and New York were 3 shillings, or as money then went, 40 cents a day; at Lancaster, $8 to $10 a month. Elsewhere in Pennsylvania workmen were content with $6 in summer and $5 in winter. At Baltimore men were glad to be hired at 18 pence a day. None by the month asked more than $5. At Fredericksburg the price of labor was from $5 to $7. In Virginia white men employed by the year were given £16, currency; slaves, when hired, were clothed and their masters paid £1 a month. A pound, Virginia money, was, in Federal money, $3.33. The average rate of wages the land over was, therefore, $65 a year, with food and perhaps lodging. Out of this small sum the workingman must, with his wife's help, maintain his family.

Here we have a starting-point, the lowest in the scale of wages during the present century. From that point the rate of wages has risen, not only among manufacturing operatives, but with every class of wage-workers. The Massachusetts Bureau of Statistics, in their sixteenth annual report, shows that from 1830 to 1860 there was a steady, gradual rise in the rate of wages, and that though occasional fluctuations apparently retarded the advance, yet the increase for the whole period was steady and regular. Commercial panics, like those of 1837 and 1857, checked the rise, but with returning confidence and renewed business the advance went forward, and hat from 1860 tto 1873 the rise in the rate of wages continued until the panic in the latter year checked the advance, which yielded to the general stagnation that pervaded the country until 1880; and that from 1880 to 1886 the advance was 28.36 per cent.

In England the advance in the rate of wages has likewise been steady and regular; but there, also, fluctuations were occasional. Mr. George Lord, president of the Manchester Board of Trade, shows that from 1850 to 1883 the advance was 39.18 per cent. If protective tariffs in the United States were the sole cause, or even a material and important cause, for an advance of 28.36 per cent., the policy of free trade in England must be credited with the larger advance of 39.18 per cent. But the fact is that to neither protection nor free trade is the advance in the rate of wages to be credited. The advance came independently of both policies and from other causes.

In this country two important factors contributed to the increase. Our vast unpeopled public domain, with our beneficent homestead laws, drew a great number of ill-paid operatives from the factories to the fields. That immense army of tramps, which but a few years back were marching over the country seeking bread by begging, have found on our public domain a camping ground, and have almost entirely disappeared from the kitchen gardens of country houses, and have become useful members in the ranks of production. Improved machinery had driven them from the factories, and our public domain took them in and ministered to their wants.

The second cause for the advance of the rate of wages is to be found in the fact that manual labor has been supplanted by machinery. It has been roughly estimated that in some industries one man in 1888 can do the work that required scores of men to do in 1800, so that whilst the improvement in machinery has reduced the number of employés it has multiplied the fruits of their labor.

It will not be questioned that the cost of labor is an element in the price of manufactured products. But it is almost susceptible of demonstration that it is not the rate of wages, but the sum of wages which enters into the cost of the manufactured article. This cost is made up of capital, raw material, and labor. Whatever reduces the cost of one of these elements competition will be swift to seize upon. Improved machinery, by reducing the number of employés, lessens the sum of the cost of labor, and therefore the cost of its product also, and at the same time, by its necessities, increases the rate of wages to those employed. What, then, becomes of the protective maxim that "low prices make low wages," when it is a fact that the prices of all kinds of manufactured products were never lower and the average rate of wages was never higher than at present.

The fall in the prices of manufactured goods would have been greater than it has been, and as great as it has been in England, if the "protective tariff" had not taxed raw material, and thus kept up the cost of one of the most important elements of production.

The report of the Massachusetts Bureau of Statistics confirms this view of the reduction of the sum of wages, and the effect of that reduction upon the rate of wages. It says:

In proportion as capital, through machinery, becomes more effective, the relative number of laborers is decreased in proportion to products, the rate of wages is increased and the sum of wages is reduced; that is, lower cost is compassed by way of higher wages.

Protective duties, therefore, brought no increase in the rate of wages, but the advance is the result of the diminished number of operatives. Improved machinery did not alone effect this result. As before stated, many have been drawn away from manufacturing pursuits with the hope for a better condition of life held out by our homestead laws and the rich soil of our public domain. Hence, it is apparent that the wages of labor in the United States are not gauged by "protective" duties, nor measured by those of the poorly paid of any country. The different States and Territories into which this great country is divided, and between which there is no embargo upon trade, differ among themselves in respect to wages of labor. The difference in wages in the same industries in different sections of the United States is well illustrated in the following returns of wages in the iron industries of different States made under the census of 1880:

Unskilled labor in blast furnaces in Virginia, 82 cents per day; in Alabama, 98 cents; in Pennsylvania, $1.09, and in Mississippi, $1.29. Skilled labor in iron-rolling mills in Alabama, $2.25 per day; in Massachusetts, $2.70; in Pennsylvania, $3.03; in Ohio, $3.87; and in Kentucky $4.62. The yearly average wages in the aggregate iron industries of the different sections of the United States are reported as follows: Eastern States, $417; Western, $396; Pacific, $354; Southern, $304.

"Where two employers run after one workman, wages rise; but when two workmen run after one employer, wages fall." In this country cheap public lands and manufactures are the two employers running after the one workman, and wages are high. In England, where there is no public land there is only the one employer, manufactures, after whom all workmen run, and wages are low.

In the United States those industries which are not protected pay the highest wages. In the building trades, where foreign competition is impossible, the wages paid are nearly double those of many foreign countries. According to the last census the average yearly wages of the unprotected railway employé was $450, whilst those of the protected iron-workers are only $312.

It is true that wages are higher in America than in Europe, but it is also true that they are higher in England than in France or Germany. I have seen it stated that the average weekly wages in fifteen employments in free-trade England were $7.07 as compared with an average of $3.64 in the same employments in protectionist Germany. And though the products of low-priced German labor, with the exception of wines, liquors, and tobacco, are admitted free into England, wages there, as we have heretofore shown, have risen more rapidly than in "protected" America. If the competition of cheap German labor does not operate to reduce wages in England, why should the American laborer, more than 3,000 miles away, need to be protected from it? It seems to me a moment's thought should convince him he has nothing to fear from a reduction of tariff duties to a revenue basis, "for nine-tenths of all the arts and manufactures of the country exist by reason of necessity and not by reason of any system of revenue laws; not by any discrimination in the imposition of duties; not from any cause which it is in the power of legislation to promote, except by assuring personal safety, the enforcement of contracts, and an honest dollar as the unit of money."

Owing to great natural advantages, which the tariff neither gave nor can take away, labor intelligently applied will yield larger returns in this country than in Europe, hence it commands better wages. It has always been so, and to this fact we are mainly indebted for the immigration which for the last two hundred years has been crowding our shores and swelling our population.

Who is the laboring man for whom protection is asked? Is not the settler who pre-empts a home in the far West, toils early and late, withstands all untoward circumstances, and labors longer than from sun to sun to lift the mortgage off his little farm, in every sense a laboring man? Do you protect him by retaining a tariff tax on lumber which he uses to construct his house, the nails that hold it together, the carpet that covers his floors, the stoves in which he burns taxed coal, the barbed wire that incloses his fields, and the iron out of which are made all his farming utensils? And do you treat him fairly when you tax the salt with which he cures his "unprotected" pork, while the salt with which the New Englander cures his "protected" fish is not taxed?

The American workingman, who is compelled to sell his labor here at home in competition with that of every clime, is surely not benefited by a prohibitory tariff which compels him to pay an increased price for nearly every article that enters into his daily use. Free trade in labor, but "protection" for everything which labor must buy, is so manifestly unjust as to merit universal condemnation.

At the other end of this Capitol the President has been charged with wanton disregard for American interests and American labor, because he has asked Congress to reduce the burden of unnecessary taxes and to stop the accumulation of money in the Treasury for which the Government has no present need. But the message in which he directs attention to the "forgotten millions" of our countrymen will withstand all the assaults which the apologists of protection can make upon it. No other message ever carried such welcome news since "Peace on earth, good will to men" was proclaimed. If in this message he made no reference to the Deity, as has been alleged, he adhered strictly to the Constitution, which mentions neither the Almighty nor the "protective" tariff. [Laughter and applause.] In this connection it is useless to discuss "free trade," because whatever that may be in theory it can have no practical application in this country so long as the people prefer indirect to direct taxation. There must be revenue, and very large revenue, to meet the public expenditures, pay the interest, provide for the extinguishment of the public debt and discharge the nation's obligations to its pensioners, and many other items of expenditure which the people tolerate under a system of indirect taxation. While, therefore, this stealthy method of taxation must continue to supply the great bulk of the revenue of the Government, both constitutional obligation and wise public policy demand that import duties be confined to their legally prescribed purpose, "to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare." This restriction of import duties to their constitutional use can not now be opposed by the arguments which Mr. Clay urged in support of his "American system."

At this time no "general distress pervades the whole country." There is no "alarming diminution of the circulating medium," except such as the protective policy has caused by accumulating an immense surplus in the Treasury. There is no "universal complaint of the want of employment," and "no consequent reduction of the wages of labor." On the contrary every condition of trade and business proclaims national prosperity and individual happiness. There do and always will exist poverty, wretchedness, and want among sixty millions of people —"For ye have the poor always with you." Poverty can neither be repealed, abolished, nor prevented by Congressional legislation. No system of human laws can convert the thriftless into the frugal, the improvident into the saving, the dissipated into the temperate. The present condition of our trade and business, aside from constitutional consideration, offers no excuse or justification for the further continuance of a system of high protective duties; and when that system pours into the Treasury more revenue than the Government requires, and creates a surplus, which, lying idle in its vaults, hampers and hinders the commercial transactions of the whole country, Congress is confronted with a duty, the failure to discharge which would be criminal. Two streams pour their constant currents into the Treasury, both proceeding from the purses and pockets of the people. The one brings its contributions from whisky and tobacco; the other extorts its tribute from the necessities and comforts of life. Their combined supply is no longer needed, and one or the other must be cut off. Which shall it be? Free whisky or free wool; free tobacco or free tin? Shall the internal revenue or the customs duties be reduced, or shall there be a compromise, taking here a little and there a little, regarding no principle upon which the revenue is founded, but adopting the shifting expedients of a paternal government?

While unalterably opposed to a system of customs duties devised and constructed to benefit the few at the expense of the many, I am equally unwilling to deprive our manufacturing interests of the benefits which they would receive from a just distribution of revenue duties. I therefore think it unwise to take the tax off such luxuries as whisky and tobacco in order that raw material and the necessaries of life may continue burdened with a tariff hurtful to the manufacturing interests and injurious to the prosperity of the whole country. Nor do I think it wise to continue customs duties on those articles of prime importance, whose prices are unnaturally kept up by

COMBINATIONS, POOLS, AND TRUSTS.

It is now nearly a century since Mr. Hamilton, in his report as Secretary of the Treasury, stated that when once protection had established manufactures on a firm basis, competition would correct and prevent the growth of monopolies; and in 1824 Mr. Clay iterated the same allurring and deceptive statement. But this proposition is proven to be fallacious by the unexampled rise and flourishing condition of monopoly in nearly every class of manufactured products under the highest "protective" tariff in the history of our country. It is not to be denied that lower prices have been steadily coming, coming to free-trade England as well as to protective America, coming from causes which, although contemporaneous with, are wholly independent of our tariff policy. But monopoly, instead of being crushed out by competition, has seized upon tariff, competition, manufactures, people, and Government, until the Standard Oil Company, the Bessemer-steel combination, the sugar, the cotton-seed oil, the lead, and the salt trusts, the rubber pool, and scores of other combinations now dictate their own terms, by arbitrary rule, regardless of all the elements which, in unrestricted trade, make up and constitute legitimate price. The only consideration which influences these grasping combinations is how much the people will bear and continue to use their commodities.

By these trusts, the outgrowth of our present tariff duties, prices have been advanced and maintained at a rate above what they would have reached had they been left to the operation of the natural laws of trade. Bessemer steel, under the protection of a high duty and the fostering care of a gigantic combination, puts into the coffers of its makers an enormous revenue, which, though first paid by the builders of railroads, is finally extorted from the agricultural and other shipping classes in exorbitant freight charges. This has been so clearly shown by Mr. Watterson, in Harper's Magazine for January, 1888, that I beg leave to repeat his statement here:

In the year 1886 the product of the American steel-rail combination was 1,500,000 tons. There are in the United States about 140,000 miles of railroad, and this year the new roads will reach to 10,000 miles, possibly to 12,000. Ninety tons of steel rails are used for every mile of road where steel is used. It is safe to say that the steel rails cost the companies $15 more per ton, year in and year out, because of the tariff, or $1,350 for every mile of road built. Multiplying this by 10,000 for the number of miles built in 1887, for the new roads alone the tax is $13,500,000. These rails last only ten years. The entire railroad system of the United States has to be renewed every ten years; or at the rate at present of 14,000 a year, the additional cost of this at $1,350 per mile or for 14,000 miles, is $18,900,000. In other words, the tariff will soon impose upon the builders of new roads, and on those who renew old ones as they wear out, a tax of $32,400,000 in excess of what the cost would be were the American railroads permitted to purchase rails where they could buy them cheapest.

The Bessemer-steel rail combination is permitted and encouraged by "protection" to extort such high prices from railroads that the companies are compelled to recoup on the agricultural productions of the whole country, and thus the protected Bessemer-steel combination levies its contributions on agriculture, trade, and business, until,

> As naturalists observe, a flea
> Has smaller fleas that on him prey;
> And these have smaller still to bite 'em,
> And so proceed ad infinitum.

One protected interest bites and sucks another, and all bleed and exhaust the people. Thus protection enables Pennsylvania iron to levy its contribution on Ohio wool, yet both States are loud in their demands for the protective system.

The salt trust, composed of sixty-three companies, fleeces the people with the help of a duty of 39.3 per cent. on imported salt, and every pound of pork, bacon, beef, and other provisions which require salt to preserve them for food purposes, pays its tribute to that trust.

Sugar is protected by an average duty of 82.04 per cent., and a refiners' trust reaps the benefit of a protection originally intended for the Louisiana planter.

Rubber shoes, with an import duty of 25 per cent., have also their trust, with $50,000,000 capital, to keep up the cost of dry feet.

One can not spread a table-cloth without paying tribute to a combination, nor a floor-cloth without contributing an extra profit and 40 per cent. duty to a trust whose circular says:

> Members have paid into the association large sums of money, which are forfeitable on the violation by them of any of the provisions of the association. They have also bound all their salesmen and agents to maintain strictly the terms which they themselves have agreed to.

Violations of the agreement to maintain prices are punishable by a fine of $500. Dealers who can show that they have maintained the prices fixed for the season from December 1, 1887, to May 31, 1888, will receive from the official of the pool a rebate of from 15 to 17½ per cent. But they are not to sell to retailers who sell at prices under the schedule. "The association," says the circular, "will not reduce prices prior to June 1, 1888. They reserve to themselves the right to advance the same at any time without notice." The first effect of the formation of this virtual trust was an advance in the price of oil-cloths of 65 per cent.; that is to say, prices have been advanced that much beyond the figure at which some manufacturers could sell oil-cloths with profit. The 65 per cent. is extra profit to the members of the association and extra loss to buyers.

These combinations, pools, and trusts, the inventions and schemes of cunning men, pervade almost every branch of business. They are made possible by our iniquitous tariff system, and they add hours to the labor of the workingman; they hinder the alleviation of the people and retard the progress of civilization.

I have endeavored to show that every basic principle of the protective theory—commercial independence, the home market, the protection of labor, and the prevention of monopoly—is delusive, and can not stand the test of reason and experience; that commercial independence, if realized, would be calamitous; that the home market of sixty millions of people has failed to prevent $700,000,000 of our products yearly seeking the markets of the world; that labor owes the rise in the rate of wages to our public lands and to the inventive genius of our people, and that monopoly, instead of being prevented by competition, has been promoted by the restrictive policy.

The fallacies which foster protection are not less inimical to the interests of the people than the modes in which its tributes are levied. Articles of prime necessity are taxed until they are made to pay 80 per cent. of the duty collected. Raw materials, which enter into manufactures, starting with a tax in their simplest form, are followed by other duties after every change to which they may be subjected, until double and triple and quadruple duties enhance the cost of the simplest and most needed article. Iron ore is taxed 75 cents per ton. An average of 3,000 pounds of iron ore make 2,240 pounds of pig-iron, and the tax on ore is over $1 on the ton of pig-iron in the first stage of manufacture. The duty on pig-iron is three-tenths of a cent per pound, or $6.72 per ton, which, added to the $1 on iron ore, makes $7.72 of tax at the second stage of manufacture, and through every other form which the iron may take taxation follows and increases and ceases not through all the life of the metal until oxidation has returned it to the earth.

The report on the "mineral resources" for 1886 states the domestic iron ore consumed in that year to have been 10,000,000 long tons, valued at the mines at $28,000,000; that imported iron ores consumed was 1,039,433 long tons; total iron ore consumed, 11,039,433 long tons. That of pig-iron there was made 5,683,329 long tons, valued at the furnace at $95,195,760. A ton of iron ore is worth $2.80, and a ton of pig-iron $16.75, according to the figures of the same report. From the same source we learn that the "total spot value of all iron and steel in the first stage of manufacture, excluding all duplications, was $142,500,000. Notwithstanding the large output of American ore, 1,098,565 long tons of foreign ores were imported. While the United States produced in 1886 28 per cent. of the world's production of pig-iron and 34 per cent. of the world's production of steel, it was found necessary to draw on foreign countries for more than 1,000,000 tons of ore. This importation can not be accounted for on the supposition that more ore was required than was mined in the country, but was due to the fact that American ores are too rich in phosphorus for Bessemer steel making, and in order to work American ores for this purpose they must be mixed with one-third such carbonaceous ores as we import. Here is a reason and argument for putting carbonaceous iron ore on the free-list as a means of increasing the consumption of American ore. Instead of being competitors in the same market the American and certain of the foreign ores are of mutual aid and assistance and together are necessary for the fullest development of the American iron-ore business. Among the raw materials few occupy a more important rank than

WOOL.

Raw wool, as a product, belongs to agriculture, while its fabrics belong to manufactures, and both should receive the most careful consideration by this Congress. The friends of this great interest are not now, and never have been, united as to the legislation which would best promote it. Some of the manufacturers demand high duty as a protection to the American farmer growing wool, but these regard all foreign wools as competitors in the market with the American wool. But the conditions of climate and soil, which affect the weight and fineness and softness of the fleece, are not within the control of legislation, and can not be altered by any duty on imported wool. The softness of the fiber is not dependent on the fineness, and this quality, which affects the price of cloth from 20 to 25 per cent., will influence the price of the fleece, and can not be changed by any import duty. Mr. Bakewell has shown that the degree of softness depends principally on the nature of the soil from which the sheep are fed—the chalk or light calcareous soils producing hard wool, while loamy, argillaceous soils grow a wool distinguished by its softness. The influence of climate and soil on the fiber is as marked in the United States as in England. Mr. Schoenhof has shown that the alluvial soils produce a wool which he says "is ill adapted to compete with the soft, elastic staples of other climes," and Consul Griffith says that the—

> Modification of the present duties on Australasian wools would undoubtedly give a great impetus to the commerce of both countries. The United States would then draw more largely than ever on the colonies for all wools suitable for fine and superfine cloths and ladies' dress goods. * * * In the event of the reduction of the duties on Australasian wools, or of the admission of the class of wools peculiar to that country and not grown in the United States, the American mill-owner would soon be in a position not only to undersell in his own market all woolen fabrics of a foreign make, but to compete successfully with other woolen manufacturing countries in the various markets of the world. At the same time the American flock-master would not experience any loss by the change in the tariff, as the wools imported would be of a different quality from those which he is able to produce.

Our manufacturers need the finer fiber of imported wools to work into and with the domestic wool. Thus a duty on foreign wools operates to some extent to lessen the consumption of domestic wool. Therefore it will be to the interest of those engaged in sheep husbandry to place raw wool on the free-list, and thus open a way to increased manufacture of woolen goods at cheaper prices, thereby encouraging and increasing a larger consumption of American wool. Schoenhoff says—

> Free wool and an average tariff duty of 25 per cent. on imported woolen fabrics would be a far more effective preventive against the danger of foreign woolen inundation than our present 75 per cent. tariff and taxed wool.

TIN-PLATE

is another article upon which tariff duties are levied that are in no sense "protective" to any American industry, and serve no other purpose than to increase the annual surplus in the Treasury and to further impoverish the people. The preservation of fruits, vegetables, fish, oysters, and meats in tin cans is an industry which is annually increasing in volume and value. This industry multiplies the comforts of life by supplying food out of season, and provides a market for agricultural products, some of which would otherwise rot and waste; and also affords employment to hundreds of men, women, and children at profitable wages. Not only so, but it encourages and stimulates the growing of small fruits and vegetables, which greatly aids the farmer in these days of agricultural depression. His interest in this connection should be considered, for in the last two decades immense areas of new land have been opened to cultivation, and the production of the cereals largely increased, so as to make necessary a more extended market for our products, but a prohibitory tariff partially excludes us from foreign markets until our supply so far exceeds the home demand as to render the staple farm products no longer profitable. Once American wheat was heavily exported at prices that were remunerative, but other countries, particularly England, failing to trade with us upon equal or satisfactory terms, have encouraged wheat-growing in India and elsewhere, where they can dispose of their own commodities, and are drawing supplies from these sources which they formerly purchased in the United States.

Therefore in the name of the American farmer I appeal to this House to ratify the action of the Committee on Ways and Means in placing tin-plate on the free-list. No good reason can be assigned why this should not be done. Everybody in America uses tin-plate, and nobody here produces it. Everybody pays the tax upon it, and nobody reaps the benefit of it. The Government does not need it and has no legitimate use for it. Why, then, should this tax be continued?

In a single county of the district I have the honor to represent in this House there were packed in the year 1882, and the business is much larger at present, 38,400,000 cans of hermetically-sealed goods. This was the output of 300 factories, which gave employment to 16,000 persons. The product packed in that one county required 10,000 acres for tomatoes and 5,000 acres for corn, involving an outlay for agricultural labor of $200,000. One hundred and thirty thousand boxes of tin were used in making the cans, and $135,000 expended for labor, while a further expenditure of $900,000 was required for the other processes of preparation. Tin-plate is the only material yet discovered that is fitted for the purpose of hermetically sealing products for transportation over long distances. Its lightness, cleanliness, non-corrosiveness, and strength combine to make it essential to the business. As tin-plate is not manufactured in this country, there is no just reason for retaining a tariff tax upon its importation. The effort to produce tin from the cassiterite of the Black Hills of Dakota will hardly justify a tax on imported tin; that of Ashland County, Alabama, has been shown to contain no trace of tin, but to be merely iron pyrites; the tin deposit in Virginia is no longer worked, so that all the American tin which can be "protected" is "a small piece received by the United States Geological Survey, said to have been obtained from cassiterite in the great American lode located near Rosita, Custer County, Colorado." To "protect" that small piece of American tin costs the people who use canned goods an enormous sum of money. The 130,000 boxes of tin before mentioned cost my people in tariff taxes in a single year $171,600. It is estimated that there is more than $90,000,000 invested capital in this industry.

In addition to the enormous home consumption there were exported last year 43,050,588 pounds of beef in cans, 16,229,163 pounds of canned salmon, canned fruit valued at $506,794, and canned vegetables valued at $228,567. A trade in canned oysters is beginning, which promises to become in time very extensive and of great value. Petroleum is also exported in tin cans. This metal, of such universal use, is burdened with a heavy and unnecessary tax, which aggregated last year $5,706,434 on an import value of $16,883,814, or over 34 per cent.—a tax which is not only hurtful to an interest intimately related to the profitable development of many branches of agriculture and to labor, but which adds to the cost of the builder's tin roof and the utensils of every household in the land. The Government no longer needs the revenue from this tax; there is no tin found in the country to "protect," and the continuance of this needless and hurtful impost is a violation of every principle of political economy.

The platforms of both political parties in the last two Presidential canvasses, the whole press of the country, and the universal sentiment of the people admit the necessity for and demand a prompt reduction of the revenue. The only obstacle that hinders this reasonable demand is the alleged "protection" of established and prosperous manufacturing interests. This form of favoritism should cease, and the revenue reform demanded by the best consideration for the welfare of the whole country should no longer be delayed. The bill now under consideration proposes to bring about this reform by a fair distribution of duties without discriminating against any industry.

The recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury "to add to the free-list as many articles as possible," and to "reduce duties upon every dutiable article to the lowest point possible," fairly and distinctly states the scope of the popular demand for revenue reform. This wise suggestion is guarded, however, by the caution that "the present situation of labor and business must always be kept in mind." I respectfully submit that neither labor nor business will be injured or embarrassed by the proposed reduction of $50,000,000 or more from customs duties. If from the $228,000,000 of estimated annual customs duties there be taken $50,000,000, there will remain $178,000,000 to be collected from the competitors of our varied manufactured products, and there would be left in all $333,000,000 of receipts to meet an expenditure of $326,000,000, thus leaving a surplus of $7,000,000, which may be further increased by economy in the public service, and which will be ample for all proper purposes.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

In this estimate the internal revenue is retained in its entirety, and why should it be repealed at this time, either in part or in whole? The most plausible reasons assigned for its repeal are, first, that it is a relic of the late war, which ought to be abandoned in time of peace. This is more sentimental than wise. The present tariff is not less a relic of the late war, from which it originated, and to meet the demands of which it was devised. If all that reminds us of that sad event is to be done away with, then free trade must indeed prevail, and even the pension-list must be abolished.

Second, it is urged that the internal revenue necessitates an army of tax collectors, inspectors, and other officers, which is a menace to our politics and the purity of our elections. But this is an objection which may be removed without repealing the system. Of all the modes of taxation yet devised, the existing internal-revenue tax is the least burdensome to production, and it is one of which consumption makes but little complaint. The demand for its repeal originates with those who would retain high import duties and continue the onerous "protective" system. These newly discovered friends of the agriculturist, who tax sugar, iron, clothing, and almost every article of daily consumption, in order to make whisky and tobacco free, represent the grower of the latter as demanding the right to sell his product at any place and to any purchaser without the surveillance of the Government. While that principle of free trade is not disputed, it must not be forgotten that the grower of tobacco has always demanded State inspection laws for his protection—laws which require that tobacco be sold, inspected, and stamped from State warehouses.

The repeal of this tax would not put one penny into the purse of the grower, while it would destroy to a very great extent the value of the "brands," which have been established with great care, labor, and expense by the manufacturers. When the sale of manufactured tobacco in packages is no longer required by law, every grocer and dealer can sell tobaccos of each "brand" from the same barrel under the counter, all the peculiarities, virtues, and preference which years of care have given to certain brands will disappear, and loss and ruin follow to the manufacturer, in order that protection may keep up the price of iron and steel, of blankets and woolen goods, and all the other necessaries of life.

In considering the reduction which the repeal of the internal-revenue tax will make in the receipts of the Government, there is a peculiar pertinency in the question of the Secretary of the Treasury:

> Is it the part of statesmanship to give up a revenue so easily collected, to unaccustom our people to its payment, and to do away with all the machinery for its collection, when, unless we are more favored than other nations of the world, there will come a day when it will all be needed?

This need was felt at the beginning of the war of 1812, and expressed by Mr. Dallas, the then Secretary of the Treasury. In his report on the finances for 1815, he says:

> It certainly furnishes a lesson of practical policy that there existed no system by which the internal resources of the country could be brought at once into action when the resources of its external commerce became incompetent to answer the exigencies of the time. The existence of such a system would probably have invigorated the early movements of the war; might have preserved the public credit unimpaired, and would have rendered the pecuniary contributions of the people more equal as well as more effective. But owing to the want of such a system, a sudden and almost exclusive resort to the public credit was necessarily adopted as the chief instrument of finance.

It was again felt in 1861, when millions were added to the cost of the war by the want of a proper internal-revenue system; and similar losses will occur if war should again find the Treasury dependent solely on customs duties for revenue. That risk it is gravely proposed to take, in order that the consumers of spirits and tobacco may be freed from a self-imposed tax which burdens no industry and hinders no prosperity.

The annual customs revenue of $228,000,000, as estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury, imposes upon each one of our 58,000,000 of population an average customs tax of $3.93, and upon each family of five persons $19.65. These seemingly small amounts come from the homes of the working people; they lessen the sugar that would sweeten their beverages; they compel the patches which disfigure their clothing; their effects are to be seen in the broken and mended implements with which labor delves for daily bread; and they may yet cause to be inscribed on these walls that we have been weighed in the balance and found wanting in proper care and regard for the people's hardships.

The people whom I represent will make any necessary sacrifice to maintain unimpaired the credit and honor of the Federal Government; but having in the last twenty-two years paid their full proportion of the taxes which resulted in a surplus, the total of which is officially stated to have been $1,491,845,953.12, now feel that the time has come to draw the line for home and family, and hence they are in hearty accord with the President in his earnest effort to abolish unnecessary taxes and prevent the increase of a harmful surplus. The issue made by the President is in no sense a party one. His Republican predecessor earnestly recommended a reduction of taxes and surplus; four Secretaries of the Treasury—two Republican and two Democratic—have urged the same wise measures. The platforms of the Republican and Democratic parties have alike declared for and committed those parties to a reduction of taxes and a return to an economical expenditure of the public funds. Unfortunately the country is on the eve of a Presidential election, and there are those who seek to throw about "protection" a glamour to deceive the people into the belief that the rate of wages will be lowered by a reduction of taxes. The danger that confronts wages does not come from reduced taxes, neither does it proceed, as I have heretofore shown, from competition with the pauper labor of foreign countries, but rather in the continuance of a system of taxation that pours into the Treasury immense sums for which there is no legitimate outlet, lurks the danger, threatening alike to labor and to capital. This danger to the prosperity of the country has been brought to the attention of Congress by the President and his Secretary of the Treasury. Public opinion, as voiced by almost every newspaper, recognizes and admits it.

The exigency is not denied; only the remedy is in dispute. On either side of that dispute the two great political parties of the country are aligned. The Democratic party would reduce the revenue by lessening the tax upon food, clothing, and other necessaries of life. The Republican party would effect such reduction by curtailing the tax on spirits and tobacco. Upon the issues thus joined the Democratic party is ready for trial, before Congress first and the people afterwards. [Applause.]

During the delivery of the foregoing speech, the hour having expired,

On motion of Mr. SPRINGER, by unanimous consent, Mr. SHAW was granted leave to continue until his remarks were concluded.

THE TARIFF AND THE FARMER.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Chairman, In the remarks that I shall have the honor of submitting in support of the bill under consideration, the question will be considered from the standpoint of the farmer. This class has not at all times received the full measure of justice at the hands of this body—a class engaged in the oldest and largest industry of our country; there being 52 per cent. of our entire population engaged therein or directly dependent upon it for support. Of persons in the United States pursuing gainful occupations there are 17,392,099, divided as follows, to wit:

Agriculture	7,670,493
Professional and personal services	4,074,238
Manufacturing, mechanical, and mining	3,837,112
Trade and transportation	1,810,256

I will endeavor to show how small is the number of our population engaged in the protected industries or can in any way be benefited by the protective policy, and how great are the burdens laid upon a much larger number for the benefit of a favored class. It will not be seriously insisted that high tariff duties can benefit the large serving and laboring classes embraced in the following tables:

Those engaged in trade and transportation can derive no profit from high duties upon imports, but, on the contrary, their business is often depressed in consequence of the burdens incident to such duties. Their business being of such a character that it can not be affected by foreign competition, being purely domestic and internal, it can not be injured by low duties, but, on the other hand, greatly benefited. Likewise, the tradesman's business is frequently diminished in consequence of the increased cost of the commodities he may deal in, caused by the high rate of duty imposed, and his per cent. of profit will be no greater because of the protective duty on the imported articles, or the domestic of similar kind.

MECHANICAL.

Very few, if any, engaged in the mechanical industries derive any benefit from protection, and the same may be asserted of those who labor in the mines. The petroleum and anthracite mine laborers, aggregating a large number, derive no benefit from high duties, as these products are not protected, being cheaper here than elsewhere, in consequence of their abundance; but on the contrary the laborers are injured and deeply wronged by being compelled to work in competition with the lowest and most degraded classes imported from Italy, Bohemia, and Hungary.

PROFESSIONAL AND PERSONAL SERVICES.

Can high-tariff taxes in any way improve the condition of the more than 1,000,000 domestic servants; the 64,698 clergymen; the 85,671 physicians and surgeons; the 84,000 soldiers, sailors, and marines; the 227,710 teachers and scientific persons; or that defenseless class, the 64,137 lawyers? The poorly paid clergymen, as well as other classes mentioned, are compelled to pay an increased price for every article they buy or consume, and are in no way compensated therefor for the enhanced cost of their living; nor are any of the above named, except the lawyers, who reap an abundant harvest of fees on account of false invoices and smuggling induced by excessive duties on imports.

THE FARMER AND THE LABORER.

Mr. Chairman, I now come to that class whose shoulders are generally considered broad enough to bear the burdens that manufacturers and their protectionist friends impose upon them, to promote and build up the private interests of the former. The 4,225,945 farmers and the nearly 4,000,000 of farm laborers are not only not benefited by this policy, but are made the burden-bearers of the more favored and tenderly cared-for manufacturers. Unprotected agriculture furnishes 74 per cent. of our exports, and is heavily taxed to build up and support the manufacturer, who furnishes only 19 per cent. of exports. The cotton planter gets no benefit from high-tariff taxes because he supplies the home demand and sends abroad the largest surplus exported from the country—last year, $215,974,267. His product is on the free-list and comes in free of duty, notwithstanding there was imported last year $683,596 of raw cotton. These imported cottons rank between our uplands and the sea island, and are used in the manufacture of printed muslins and the making of the higher numbers of spool thread; and it comes from Egypt, Turkey, and South America.

WHEAT

is the second largest product of the soil exported, aggregating last year $140,768,915. Ours is the largest wheat as well as the largest cotton growing country on the globe, though we imported, during 1877, $237,605 worth of the former, chiefly from Manitoba and other provinces of the Dominion of Canada. Protectionists have asserted that this country would, in a few years, need greater protection for its wheat, as India was coming to the front as a wheat-exporting country. But we need have no apprehension from that quarter as India is an effete nation, degraded by paganism and misrule, though a recent spasmodic revival of her agricultural industries through British capital and enterprise has enabled that country to export wheat to England in considerable quantities. This exportation will not continue, as the entire crop, 250,000,000 of bushels (just 1 bushel to the inhabitant) is required at home to feed the hungry laborers, if their pittance of wages would enable them to pay for it. Wheat is sometimes exported from that country when it is threatened with famine, and its half-fed farm laborers can never successfully compete with our country, so much more favored in climate and laws. Australia, Chili, and the Argentine Republic occasionally, export small quantities of wheat to Europe, and this will probably increase.

PROVISIONS

come third in the order of value of our exports, amounting, in 1867, to $93,760,932; it is true that some qualities of dairy products are yet imported, but to no very great extent. France and Germany have laid an embargo on the importation of hog products for the alleged reason that ours is not a wholesome food product; but a more plausible reason can be found in the fact that it is a retaliatory measure in consideration of our almost prohibitory duty on the woolens and other textile fabrics of those countries. This country produces 47 per cent. of the hog crop of the world, and certainly the hog industry need fear no competition from abroad.

Cereals and live-stock of 1887.

Products.	Exported.	Imported.
Indian corn	$18,279,404	$13,537
Live-stock	10,095,874	8,110,236
Oats	401,140	68,608
Rye	195,120	8,371
Barley	243,605	7,716,710

Now, of all the products of the farm, the garden, and the orchard we export largely more than we import, save that alone of barley, so that import duties upon farm products are a sham and a fallacy.

I have omitted from the above tables sugar, wool, and rice, as the duties upon the first and third articles are strictly revenue duties, and the revenue derived from sugar is the largest derived from any single imported commodity. And the same may be said of rice. Whilst the per cent. of revenue collected on each of the two is proportionally large, each is incidentally protected in accordance with Democratic traditions. The duties on sugar have to some extent been specific, and have been graduated and measured according to the Dutch standard of color. The standard of valuation was taken advantage of and frauds committed on the customs laws, the West India sugar-planters having discoved a harmless process by which they could so discolor their sugar as to make it almost black, thereby securing its passage through the custom-house at a much lower rate of duty than its value justified. This coloring matter is easily washed out, and the refining adds but a small fraction of the original cost. This mode of measuring the value of sugar has been improved upon and the polariscopic test is now applied, by which the amount of sucrose in sugar can be accurately determined.

For want of an accurate rule for determining what amount of drawback to be allowed to refiners on re-exported sugar large frauds were formerly committed, and in 1883 a commission of experts was appointed, under the direction of the Treasury, to determine what per cent. of refined sugar any given quantity of ran sugar would yield. And the discovery was made that the refiners had claimed and had been paid too large a sum as drawbacks, so that the Government had really paid out a much larger sum than it had received as import duties. I look with disfavor upon drawbacks of every kind; they have been a fruitful source of fraud and corruption. And, moreover, I consider all legislation wrong and indefensible that will enable our manufacturers to export and sell their products abroad at a profit at a less price than they will sell the same articles to our own citizens. This is constantly done by our sugar refiners under the operation of the drawback laws. The bill reduces sugar duties 20 per cent., and this will be a reasonable reduction. Hon. Thomas H. Benton declared upon the floor of the Senate that the pork-packers and fish-curers had received from the Government on the salt used in the exported pork and fish during one year more than the entire revenue receipts from imported salt for the same time.

BARLEY,

next to sugar and wool, is more largely imported into our country than any of the other products of the farm, and comes chiefly from the Dominion of Canada.

WOOL,

imported during last year, $15,645,020. It is proposed to put this product on the free-list, in order to relieve the masses of the onerous burdens imposed upon them in the way of the greatly enhanced price of their woolen clothing, blankets, hats, etc., and to place the manufacturers of woolens on an equal footing with the foreign, and to enable domestic manufacturers to export at a profit, at least to the neutral or non-manufacturing countries from which they are now excluded by reason of the tax upon the imported raw material. The ranchmen engaged in wool-growing insist that free wool will ruin their business. A little examination into our tariff legislation regarding wool will dispel this idea. Under the tariffs of 1846 and 1857 the wool industry of this country flourished and the increase in the number of sheep was enormous and the prices of wool were well sustained.

How has it been under the highly protective tariff of 1867? The number of sheep has diminished and the price of wool has gone down. The sheep husbandman was never in a more prosperous condition than under the revenue tariff of 1846. And he claims that his business has not prospered under the high duties imposed by the one of 1867, and since 1883 he has been clamorous for more protection. I am not convinced that taking the duty off wool would depress that industry beyond a short period, in which it would adjust itself to the change. The great bulk of our native wools are of the medium quality, that require admixture with the fine imported wools for making the finer fabrics. The fine combing and clothing wools are imported, chiefly from England, France, and Australia, a small quantity from the Platte Valley. By mixing these with our domestic wools, it brings up the grade, and increases the demand for the native wool, that in the main is not, unmixed, suitable for the manufacture of the best goods, such as diagonals. Most of the carpet wools come from Russia, Turkey, South America, and Mexico.

Our domestic supply of these coarse wools is quite inadequate for our manufacturing purposes, and come very little into competition with that produced in this country, except the Texas and New Mexico wools And the cost of growing these is inconsiderable, as the sheep are rarely sheltered, being day and night upon the prairies, under the care of a shepherd and his dog; thus one person will attend a flock of two thousand, simply keeping the flock together, and the wolves and coyotes from killing them. And the same custom prevails in California, where they drive the sheep to the mountains in the spring and there remain during the summer. It is unreasonable for the wool-growers of the Eastern and Middle States, including some of the older of the Western, to expect to raise sheep and wool as profitably on lands worth from $50 to $100 per acre as they did when it was only worth from $5 to $25, or as cheaply as it can be done in Texas, Australia, and the Argentine Republic, where lands can be had for a nominal price. The high-priced lands once profitably devoted to sheep husbandry will have to be surrendered to crops less bulky in comparison to their value, just as the growing of wheat in large quantities has been given up in the Eastern and Middle States, and has become domiciled upon the cheaper and more fertile soils of the Western prairies.

RAW MATERIALS.

To become a large exporter of manufactured products, we must have free raw materials, as the other great manufacturing nations have them to-day.

It is quite evident, Mr. Chairman, that our manufacturing capacity is far in advance of the home demand, and there must be found an outlet for the excess. It is estimated that if the mills, the furnaces, and forges of the country were run on full time six months in the year that their product would be as much as the home demand would require. What remedy for this condition of things would wise statesmanship point out? Bounties upon exports? Prohibitory duties upon imports? No, indeed; such a policy would unjustly burden our own people with additional taxes. Common sense and sound judgment would dictate that the law permit the domestic manufacturer to have his raw materials of manufacture free of duty. I am in favor of putting all the raw materials of manufacture on the free-list, including salt, coal, iron ore, copper, timber, and lumber, together with every article now on the free-list. Hon. Thomas H. Benton uttered the following on the floor of the Senate in regard to the prohibitive duty imposed on salt:

It is not merely odious and oppressive; it is also a species of impiety and sacrilege, of revolt and rebellion against the good providence of God, who has created salt and spread it throughout the universe for the use of man and beast. The sea is filled with it; the sun manufactures it. It comes pure and cheap from that laboratory established by the Divine wisdom and co-extensive with the bounds of the habitable globe. Laws to prevent any portion of the human race from using the pure and perfect salt made by the rays of the sun out of the waves of the sea, if enacted without a dire necessity, are impious contrivances to frustrate the beneficence of God. The duties on salt are one of the stumbling-blocks in the way of revenue reform. If those interested in the conversion of spring water into salt, in the mining of coal, and in the production of pig iron could be induced to withdraw their absurd claims for protection, it would be an easier matter to revise the tariff without in any way deranging our domestic industries.

With the raw materials free of duty, superadded to the inventive genius of our people, their superior education and enterprise, our mechanics, artisans, and manufacturers would soon outstrip and bid defiance to all competitors. The high-priced labor of our country is to-day more profitable to the manufacturer than the low-priced, enslaved labor of Europe and the East. As a class the laborers of this country are superior in all respects to others. They are better educated, physically and mentally more vigorous, and turn out largely more work in a given time than any foreign laborer, and are more expert with machinery. Their superiority in these respects is due mainly to our republican institutions. In Asia and in Europe laborers, men and women, are born under conditions and surroundings that but few are ever able to shake off. Drudgery and slavery seem to be their inheritance and portion, to the crushing out of their spirit and energy, making of them mere machines, so that all incentive to excellence is destroyed, and there is no wonder that their skill is poor and their labor inefficient. Every American laborer, however poor, knows that by his skill and thrift he may better his condition and rise in the world. The great difference between domestic labor and foreign are the laws under which they are born and live.

Under monarchy, where the few are born to titles and honors and the masses to toil and degradation, the better instincts and impulses of their nature are crushed, and the ambition to rise is never stimulated by any prospect in view. The manufacturer will at all times be able with our native labor, at higher prices than is paid abroad, to meet competition under a strictly revenue tariff, with proper discriminating duties within the revenue limits.

PROTECTION

presupposes a greater power against which the protection is sought, a superior force that excites fear and apprehension. Let us examine and ascertain if such industrial power anywhere exists, and if our fears are well founded. Our country is the most populous of all Christian countries, except Russia, and we are in no danger of her competition. Our farm products lead in quantity and value those of all other nations; our manufactures now exceed those of Great Britain; our mines are the most extensive in the world, and the annual output the largest; and our commerce, domestic and foreign combined, is larger than that of any other nation. It is true that we fall short in the ocean-carrying trade, but this should be no discouragement when we lead in all other great industries.

MINERALS.

Our country possesses the richest mineral deposits, comprising gold, silver, iron, copper, and coal. Her rocks are inlaid with oil and her caverns filled with heating and illuminating gases. And in it is found nearly four-fifths of all the anthracite coal on the globe. This lies embedded in the bowels of the earth in mountain heaps, averaging in depth from 50 to 3,300 feet. Iron ore is mined in twenty-nine States and coal in twenty-seven. Our copper mines yield nearly one-half the world's supply, and yet the cost of it to the consumer or user is doubled by its prohibitive duties. We make the largest yield of lead, and there also exists large deposits of zinc, quicksilver, nickel, cobalt, chrome, platinum, iridium, arsenic, salt, sulphur, gypsum—in fact, every mineral known to chemistry save alone that of tin. We have in abundance the speigel, so essential in the manufacture of Bessemer steel, and the ferro-manganese, used in the manufacture of mild steel.

Now, Mr. Chairman, with such marvelous resources, developed and undeveloped, and a population unequaled in skill, invention, and enterprise, is it not strange, nay, humiliating to confess inability to compete successfully with the world, or to confess inferiority to any people? But it will be said that we are a young nation and inexperienced in many branches of manufacture, and need aid and protection till we are able to stand alone. Nearly all of the leading manufacturing industries of the country are from one to two centuries old, and many of them came into existence and were prospering before we had a tariff at all. The woolen manufacture is almost as old as the settlement of the country. Cotton was spun and woven into cloth as soon as the fiber was grown on this continent, and the manufacture of leather, hardware, furniture, and paper are but little later in their origin. All the textile fabrics were manufactured at Rowley, Mass., as early as 1638, by some families from Yorkshire, England, and these industries became remunerative. (Palfrey's New England.) In 1676 there were six forges in Massachusetts making as good iron as was made in Spain. Raw cotton was imported into Massachusetts for manufacture in 1639 from Barbadoes.

HAMILTON

recommended to Congress in 1792, in his report on the public credit, that in addition to internal taxes a duty of 8 per cent. be levied on imports. The country then had a population of about 4,000,000 and a per capita debt of $13.50. The duties on imports were increased from time to time, and during the period of war between England and France and our war with the former, in 1812, under the operation of the Berlin and Milan decrees, and the British orders in council, and the embargo of Jefferson, commerce on the ocean was almost destroyed; manufactures sprang up and multiplied rapidly in this country, so that Mr. Clay began the advocacy of the protective policy and the development of his "American system." But his theory was to foster and protect our "infant industries," and the plea of protection to American labor was not heard of at that time nor for nearly half a century after.

The fallacy of protecting labor is the deceptive cry of monopolists who have grown rich and powerful through the protective duties levied upon the masses engaged in every other industry in our land. The manufacturer was content to begin in 1792 with 8 per cent., increasing to high protection in 1816, and having grown to full manhood, after more than seventy years of protection, declares that he will be ruined if duties shall be reduced below 47 per cent. These "infants" grew upon what they were fed and still cry for more bounty.

EXPORTS.

After seventy-two years of high protection the favored industries are only able to export to the extent of 2 per cent. of their products, whilst unprotected agriculture sent abroad last year 16 per cent. of the aggregate products of the soil.

EXPORTS FOR 1887.

Agriculture	$550,000,000
Mining (only a part protected)	56,250,000
Manufactures	20,500,000
Forests	7,050,000
Fisheries	7,250,000
All others	7,250,000

WHO ARE PROTECTED AND THEIR NUMBERS.

Sugar planters	1,400
Laborers employed	14,500
Rice planters, estimated	1,500
Laborers employed (estimated)	5,000
Wool-growers owning flocks of over 100 head (estimated)	50,000
Manufacturers	52,127
Aggregate capitalists	105,027
Laborers employed in protected industries	1,500,000

In round numbers it is safe to say that there are less than 1,500,000 engaged in all protected industries of our country. Expert statisticians have estimated the number as low as 1,000,000. It is claimed that there are more than a million of persons engaged in sheep husbandry, yet it is well known that much the largest proportion own small flocks, averaging from five to twenty-five head, reared chiefly for family use. And this large class pay out on the protected articles purchased (made of wool) for family use a much greater sum than they receive as bounty on their protected wool.

TAXES.

If taxes are levied to protect certain classes, the burden of such taxes must fall upon all others who are not embraced in those classes. How small is the number that belong to the privileged class, when compared with the millions who must bear the burdens of taxation for the benefit of the former.

The lordly manufacturers, numbering less than 55,000, have nearly one-half the income that falls to the lot of the 4,225,945 farmers and the nearly 4,000,000 farm laborers. The farmer's investment in real estate alone being $10,197,000,000, whilst the entire plant of the manufacturer is valued at $2,790,272,606 only. The legislation of Congress for twenty-five years shows the power and influence of capital upon our legislation, when we see that so small a number have, for so long a period, controlled legislation in their own interest to the injury and oppression of the masses.

FREE RAW MATERIALS

have had much influence in contributing to the general prosperity of the cotton, and the leather boot and shoe industries, the raw materials of each of these manufactures being admitted free of duty, and these have prospered beyond others that did not enjoy such a benefit. The manufacturing industries that have used free raw materials have realized good profits, and have contributed most largely of our exports abroad. A duty of 30 per cent. is levied on boots and shoes, and the census of 1880 shows that the manufacturers made a profit of 45 per cent. and furnished 6⅔ per cent. of our exports for that year. The average duty on cotton goods is 40.17 per cent., and the manufacturers realized a profit of 23 per cent. and furnished 6¼ per cent. of our exports. The average on iron and steel is 40.92 per cent., and the manufacturers made a profit of 19 per cent. (the raw material being taxed), and they furnished 4.7 of exports. Wool is taxed more than 10 per cent., and the manufacturers' profit was 38 per cent., and exports less than 1 per cent. Raw silk is free, and the manufacturers realized a profit of 37 per cent., and, although much the youngest of our leading industries, contributed to our exports one-quarter of 1 per cent.

as such, does not manufacture, hence he uses no raw material, unless his seeds can be called such. But he delves into the soil, plants his seed, and the judicious tillage, the light and the heat, and the moisture bring forth the germ that fructifies into an abundant harvest, under the influence of favoring seasons and other conditions. The farmer feeds our whole population without the aid of imports, with small exception, and sends abroad from 74 to 82 per cent. of our entire exports. But for his exported products the balance of trade would be greatly against us, and the country would be drained of its gold to pay the interest on the Government and corporate bonded debt held and owned abroad. And what are his profits (the farmer's)? He creates more than half the wealth of the country, and receives as his share 4 per cent. on his invested capital, less than one-fourth the profit realized from any of the important protected industries of the land.

And yet he is the most patient and uncomplaining, and only asks that fair revenue duties be imposed upon such of the imported articles as he is compelled to use, and to be relieved from the payment of excessive duties to build up and support unproductive industries. He would return to the schedule of revenue duties prevailing during the period between 1846 and 1861, the most prosperous period in our country's history, yea! her golden age, when labor was well rewarded, the farmer most prosperous, and industrial enterprises were springing up all over the land, our commerce under our own flag, floated upon every sea and port in the civilized world, and every industry flourished. We were then doing 75 per cent. of our carrying trade, and the farmers owned one-half of all the wealth of our country. How changed is the condition of affairs, after twenty-five years of high protection, with inhibition upon free ships, land grants to railroads, drawbacks to the fishermen, and subsidies to ocean-going steamships!

We find the wealth of the country mainly concentrated in the Eastern States and the corporations that have been the beneficiaries of this system of legislation. The farmers oppressed, and instead of owning one-half the wealth their earnings have been transferred to the favored classes, and they now own but one-fourth the wealth of the country, and our carrying trade has fallen to 14 per cent.

RECIPROCITY TREATIES.

Have they ever been in the interest of our farmers? Was one ever negotiated or proposed with the view of extending their markets? I assert not one but all have been with purely agricultural countries, with products similar to those of our own. Such treaties have invariably been in the interest of the manufacturer and to open up and widen his markets, regardless of their effects upon the farming interests, leaving the farmer to struggle against the adverse legislation, unaided by his Government.

No Representative has proposed commercial reciprocity with England, although she buys more than one-half of all our farm products and admits them free of duty, except tobacco. Nor has commercial reciprocity been proposed with France or Germany, and yet each purchase largely of our farm products. It is true that these governments have excluded from admission into their ports our hog products and imposed a duty on our wheat. Why has this been done? The answer is because of our prohibitive duties upon their woolens and other exports to this country. Reciprocity with each of these countries would enlarge the markets of the farmer and increase the demand for his products, but it would do the manufacturer no good; hence it has not been proposed.
